R.

R is the eighteenth letter of the English Alphabet, and an articulation sui generis, having little or no resemblance in pronunciation to any other letter. But from the position of the tongue in uttering it, it is commutable with l, into which letter it is changed in many words by the Spaniards and Portuguese, and some other nations; as l is also changed into r. It is numbered among the liquids and semi-vowels, and is sometimes called the canine letter. Its English uses, which are uniform, may be understood by the customary pronunciation of rod, rose, bar, bare, barren, brad, pride, drown.—In words which we have received from the Greek language, we follow the Latins, who wrote h after r, as rhapsody, rheum, rhetoric.

As an abbreviation, R., in English, stands for rex, king, as George R.

As a numeral, R, in Roman authors, stands for 80, and, with a dash over it, $\overline{R}$, for 80,000.

RA, as an inseparable prefix or preposition, is the Latin re, coming to us through the Italian and French, and primarily signifying again, repetition. See Re.

S.

S, the nineteenth letter of the English Alphabet, is a sibilant articulation, and numbered among the semivowels. It represents the hissing made by driving the breath between the end of the tongue and the roof of the mouth, just above the upper teeth. It has two uses; one to express a mere hissing, as in sabbath, sack, sin, this, thus; the other a vocal hissing, precisely like that of z, as in muse, wise, pronounced muze, wize. It generally has its hissing sound at the beginning of all proper English words, but in the middle and end of words, its sound is to be known only by usage. In a few words, it is silent, as in isle and viscount.

As a numeral, S. denoted seven.—In books of navigation and in common usage, S. stands for south; S. E. for south-east; S. W. for south-west; S. S. E. for south south-east; S. S. W. for south south-west, &c.

SHALL, } (shal) { v. i. verb auxiliary; pret. should. [Sax. SHAL, } { *sceal*an, scylan. Shall is defective, having no infinitive, imperative or participle.] 1. Shall is primarily in the present tense. We still use shall and should before another verb in the infinitive, without the sign to; but the signification of shall is considerably deflected from its primitive sense. It is now treated as a mere auxiliary to other verbs, serving to form some of the tenses.—In the present tense, shall, before a verb in the infinitive, forms the future tense; but its force and effect are different with the different persons or personal pronouns. Thus, in the first person, shall simply foretells or declares what will take place; as, I or we shall ride to town on Monday.—2. In the second and third persons, shall implies a promise, command or determination; as, you shall receive your wages.—3. Shall I go? shall he go? interrogatively, asks for permission or direction. But shall you go? asks for information of another's intention. 4. But after another verb, shall, in the third person, simply foretells; as, he says that he shall leave town to-morrow. So also in the second person; as you say that you shall ride to-morrow. 5. After if, and some verbs which express condition or supposition, shall, in all the persons, simply foretells.—6. Should, in the first person, implies a conditional event. 7. Should, though properly the past tense of shall, is often used to express a contingent future event; as, if it should rain to-morrow.

T.

T is the twentieth letter of the English Alphabet, and a close consonant. It represents a close joining of the end of the tongue to the root of the upper teeth, as may be perceived by the syllables at, et, ot, ut, in attempting to pronounce which, the voice is completely intercepted. It is therefore numbered among the mutes, or close articulations, and it differs from d chiefly in its closeness. The letters ti, before a vowel, and unaccented, usually pass into the sound of sh, as in nation, motion, partial. In this case, t loses entirely its proper sound. In a few words, the combination ti has the sound of the English ch, as in Christian, question.

T. as an abbreviation, stands for theologia; as, S. T. D. sanctæ theologiæ doctor, doctor of divinity.

As a numeral, T, among the Latins, stood for 160, and, with a dash over the top, $\overline{T}$, for 160,000.

U.

U is the twenty-first letter and the fifth vowel in the English Alphabet. The first, or long and proper sound of u, in English, is now not perfectly simple, and it cannot be strictly called a vowel. The sound seems to be nearly that of eu, shortened and blended. This sound, however, is not precisely that of eu, or yu, except in a few words, as in unite, union, uniform; the sound does not begin with the distinct sound of e, nor end in the distinct sound of oo, unless when prolonged. It cannot be well expressed in letters. This sound is heard in the unaffected pronunciation of annuity, numerate, brute, mute, dispute, duke.—In some words, as in bull, full, pull, the sound of u is that of the Italian u, the French ou, but shortened. This is a vowel.—U has another short sound, as in tun, run, sun, turn, rub. This, also, is a vowel.

V.

V is the twenty-second letter of the English Alphabet, and a labial articulation, formed by the junction of the upper teeth with the lower lip, as in pronouncing av, ev, ov, vain. It is not a close articulation, but one that admits of some sound. It is nearly allied to f, being formed by the same organs; but v is vocal, and f is aspirate, and this constitutes the principal difference between them. V and u were formerly the same letter, derived, no doubt, from the oriental vau or waw; but they have now as distinct uses as any two letters in the alphabet, and are therefore to be considered as different letters. V has one sound only, as in very, vote, lavish.

As a numeral, V stands for 5. With a dash over it, in old books, $\overline{V}$, it stands for 5000.

W.

W is the twenty-third letter of the English Alphabet. It takes its written form and its name from the union of two V's, this being the form of the Roman capital letter which we call U. W is, properly, a vowel, a simple sound, formed by opening the mouth with a close, circular configuration of the lips. It is precisely the ou of the French, and the u of the Spaniards, Italians and Germans. With the other vowels it forms diphthongs, which are of easy pronunciation; as in well, want, will, dwell, pronounced ooell, ooant, ooill, dooell. In English, it is always followed by another vowel, except when followed by h, as in when.—W, at the end of words, is often silent after a and o, as in law, saw, low, sow. In many words of this kind, w represents the Saxon g; in other cases, it helps to form a diphthong, as in now, vow, new, strew.

Y.

Y the twenty-fifth letter of the English Alphabet, is, taken from the Greek υ. At the beginning of words, it is called an articulation or consonant, and with some propriety perhaps, as it brings the root of the tongue in close contact with the lower part of the palate, and nearly in the position to which the close g brings it. Hence it has happened, that, in a great number of words, g has been changed into y; as the Sax. gear, into year; geornian, into yearn; gyllan, into yell; gealew, into yellow.
In the middle and at the end of words, y is precisely the same as i. It is sounded as i long, when accented, as in defy, rely; and as i short, when unaccented, as in vanity, glory, synonymous. This latter sound is a vowel. At the beginning of words, y answers to the German and Dutch j.
Y, as a numeral, stands for 150, and, with a dash over it, Ȳ, for 150,000.

PREFACE.

THE Critical Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language naturally suggested an idea of the present work. Proper names from the Greek and Latin form so considerable a part of every cultivated living language, that a Dictionary seems to be imperfect without them. Polite scholars, indeed, are seldom at a loss for the pronunciation of words they so frequently meet with in the learned languages; but there are great numbers of respectable English scholars, who, having only a tincture of classical learning, are much at a loss for a knowledge of this part of it. It is not only the learned professions that require this knowledge, but almost every one above the merely mechanical. The professors of painting, statuary, and music, and those who admire their works; readers of history, politics, poetry; all who converse on subjects ever so little above the vulgar, have so frequent occasion to pronounce these proper names, that whatever tends to render this pronunciation easy must necessarily be acceptable to the public.

The proper names in Scripture have still a higher claim to our attention. That every thing contained in that precious repository of divine truth should be rendered as easy as possible to the reader, cannot be doubted: and the very frequent occasions of pronouncing Scripture proper names, in a country where reading the Scripture makes part of the religious worship, seem to demand some work on this subject more perfect than any we have hitherto seen.

I could have wished it had been undertaken by a person of more learning and leisure than myself; but we often wait in vain for works of this kind, from those learned bodies which ought to produce them, and at last are obliged, for the best we can get, to the labours of some necessitous individual. Being long engaged in the instruction of youth, I felt the want of a work of this kind, and have supplied it in the best manner I am able. If I have been happy enough to be useful, or only so far useful as to induce some abler hand to undertake the subject, I shall think my labor amply rewarded. I shall still console myself with reflecting, that he who has produced a prior work, however inferior to those that succeed it, is under a very different predicament from him who produces an after-work, inferior to those that have gone before.

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE favorable reception of the first edition of this work has induced me to attempt to make it still more worthy of the acceptance of the public. by the addition of several critical observations, and particularly by two Terminational Vocabularies, of Greek and Latin, and Scripture Proper Names. That so much labor should be bestowed upon an inverted arrangement of these words, when they had already been given in their common alphabetical order, may be matter of wonder to many persons, who will naturally inquire into the utility of such an arrangement. To these it may be answered, that the words of all languages seem more related to each other by their terminations than by their beginnings; that the Greek and Latin languages seem more particularly to be thus related; and classing them according to their endings seemed to exhibit a new view of these languages, both curious and useful: for, as their accent and quantity depend so much on their termination, such an arrangement appeared to give an easier and more comprehensive idea of their pronunciation than the common classification by their initial syllables. This end was so desirable as to induce me to spare no pains, however dry and disgusting, to promote it; and, if the method I have taken has failed, my labor will not be entirely lost, if it convince future prosodists that it is not unworthy of their attention.

INTRODUCTION.

The pronunciation of the learned languages is much more easily acquired than that of our own. Whatever might have been the variety of the different dialects among the Greeks, and the different provinces of the Romans, their languages, now being dead, are generally pronounced according to the respective analogies of the several languages of Europe, where those languages are cultivated, without partaking of those anomalies to which the living languages are liable.

Whether one general, uniform pronunciation of the ancient languages be an object of sufficient importance to induce the learned to depart from the analogy of their own language, and to study the ancient Latin and Greek pronunciation, as they do the etymology, syntax and prosody of those languages, is a question not very easy to be decided. The question becomes still more difficult when we consider the uncertainty we are in respecting the ancient pronunciation of the Greeks and Romans, and how much the learned are divided among themselves about it.* Till these points are settled, the English may well be allowed to follow their own pronunciation of Greek and Latin, as well as other nations, even though it should be confessed that it seems to depart more from what we can gather of the ancient pronunciation, than either the Italian, French or German.† For why the English should pay a compliment to the learned languages, which is not done by any other nation in Europe, it is not easy to conceive; and as the colloquial communication of learned individuals of different nations so seldom happens, and is an object of so small importance when it does happen, it is not much to be regretted that when they meet they are scarcely intelligible to each other.‡

But the English are accused not only of departing from the genuine sound of the Greek and Latin vowels, but of violating the quantity of these languages more than the people of any other nation in Europe. The author of the Essay upon the Harmony of Language gives us a detail of the particulars by which this accusation is proved: and this is so true a picture of the English pronunciation of Latin, that I shall quote it at length, as it may be of use to those who are obliged to learn this language without the aid of a teacher.

"The falsification of the harmony by English scholars in their pronunciation of Latin, with regard to essential points, arises from two causes only: first, from a total inattention to the length of vowel sounds, making them long or short merely as chance directs; and, secondly, from sounding double consonants as only one letter. The remedy of this last fault is obvious. With regard to the first, we have already observed, that each of our vowels hath its general long sound and its general short sound totally different. Thus the short sound of e lengthened is expressed by the letter a, and the short sound of i lengthened is expressed by the letter e: and with all these anomalies usual in the application of vowel characters to the vowel sounds of our own language, we proceed to the application of vowel sounds to the vowel characters of the Latin. Thus, in the first syllable of sidus and nomen, which ought to be long, and of miser and onus, which ought to be short, we equally use the common long sound of the vowels; but in the oblique cases, sideris, nominis, miseri, oneris, &c., we use quite another sound, and that a short one. These strange anomalies are not in common to us with our

* Middleton contends that the initial c before e and i ought to be pronounced as the Italians now pronounce it; and that Cicero is neither Sisero, as the French and English pronounce it; nor Kikero, as Dr. Bentley asserts; but Tchitchero, as the Italians pronounce it at this day. This pronunciation, however, is derided by Lipsius, who affirms that the c among the Romans had always the sound of k. Lipsius says, too, that, of all the European nations, the British alone pronounce the i properly; but Middleton asserts, that of all nations they pronounce it the worst. Middleton De Lat. Liter. Pronun. Dissert.

Lipsius, speaking of the different pronunciation of the letter G in different countries, says,

Nos hodiè (de literâ G loquente) quàm peccamus? Italorum enim plerique ut Z exprimunt, Galli et Belgæ ut J consonantem. Itaque illorum est Lezere, Fuzere; nostrum, Leiere, Fuiere, (Lejere, Fujere). Omnia imperitè, ineptè. Germanos saltem audite, quorum sonus hic germanus, Legere, Tegere; ut in Lego, Tego, nec unquam variant: at nos ante I, E, Æ, Y, semper dicimusque Jemmam, Jætulos, Jinjivam, Jyrum; pro istis, Gemmam, Gætulos, Gingivam, Gyrum. Mutemus aut vapulemus.—Lipsius. De Rect. Pron. Ling. Lat. page 71.

Hinc factum est ut tanta in pronunciando varietas extiteret ut pauci inter se in literarum sonis consentiant. Quod quidem mirum non esset, si indocti tantùm à doctis in eo, ac non ipsi etiam alioqui eruditi inter se magna contentione dissiderent.—Adolp. Meker. De Lin. Græc. vct. Pronun. cap. ii. page 15.

† Monsieur Launcelot, the learned author of the Port-Royal Greek Grammar, in order to convey the sound of the long Greek vowel η, tells us, it is a sound between the e and the a, and that Eustathius, who lived towards the close of the twelfth century, says, that βῆ, βῆ, is a sound made in imitation of the bleating of a sheep; and quotes to this purpose this verse of an ancient writer called Cratinus:

'Ο δ' ἠλίθιος ὥσπερ προβάτον, βῆ, βῆ, λέγων βαδίζει.

Is fatuus perinde ac ovis, bê, bê, dicens, incedit.

He, like a silly sheep, goes crying baa.

Caninius has remarked the same, Hellen. p. 26. E longum, cujus sonus in ovium balatu sentitur, ut Cratinus et Varro tradiderunt. The sound of the e long may be perceived in the bleating of sheep, as Cratinus and Varro have handed down to us.

Eustathius likewise remarks upon the 499 v. of Iliad I. that the word Βλὼψ ἐστιν ὁ τῆς κλεψύδρας ἦχος μιμητικῶς κατὰ τους παλαίους; βῆ ἔχει μίμησιν προβάτων φωνῆς. Κράτινος. Βλὼψ est Clepsydræ sonus, ex imitatione secundum veteres; et βῆ imitatur vocem ovium. Blops, according to the ancients, is a sound in imitation of the Clepsydra, as baa is expressive of the voice of sheep. It were to be wished that the sound of every Greek vowel had been conveyed to us by as faithful a testimony as the γρα; we should certainly have had a better idea of that harmony for which the Greek language was so famous, and in which respect Quintilian candidly yields it the preference to the Latin.

Aristophanes has handed down to us the pronunciation of the Greek diphthong aŭ aŭ, by making it expressive of the barking of a dog. This pronunciation is exactly like that preserved by nurses and children among us to this day in bow wow. This is the sound of the same letters in the Latin tongue; not only in proper names derived from Greek, but in every other word where this diphthong occurs. Most nations in Europe, perhaps all but the English, pronounce audio and laudo, as if written owdio and lowdo; the diphthong sounding like ou in loud. Agreeably to this rule, it is presumed that we formerly pronounced the apostle Paul nearer the original than at present. In Henry the Eighth's time it was written St. Poule's, and sermons were preached at Poule's Cross. The vulgar, generally the last to alter, either for the better or worse, still have a jingling proverb with this pronunciation, when they say, As old as Poules.

The sound of the letter u is no less sincerely preserved in Plautus, in Menæch. page 622, edit. Lambin, in making use of it to imitate the cry of an owl—

"MEN. Egon' dedi? PEN. Tu, Tu, istic, inquam, vin' afferri noctuam, Quæ tu, tu, usque dicat tibi? nam nos jam nos defessi sumus."

"It appears here," says Mr. Forster, in his defence of the Greek accents, page 129, "that an owl's cry was tu, tu, to a Roman ear, as it is too, too, to an English." Lambin, who was a Frenchman, observes on the passage, "Alludit ad noctuæ vocem seu cantum, tu, tu, seu tou, tou." He here alludes to the voice or noise of an owl. It may be farther observed, that the English have totally departed from this sound of the u in their own language, as well as in their pronunciation of Latin.

‡ Erasmus se adfuisse olim commemorat cum die quodam solenni complures principum legati ad Maximilianum Imperatorem salutandi causâ advenissent; Singulosque Gallum, Germanum, Danum, Scotum, &c. orationem Latinam, ita barbarè ac vastè pronunciàsse, ut Italis quibusdam, nihil nisi risum moverint, qui eos non Latinè sed suâ quemque linguâ, locutos jurâssent.—Middleton, De Lat. Lit. Pronun.

The love of the marvellous prevails over truth: and I question if the greatest diversity in the pronunciation of Latin exceeds that of English at the capital and in some of the counties of Scotland, and yet the inhabitants of both have no great difficulty in understanding each other.

southern neighbours, the French, Spaniards and Italians. They pronounce sidus, according to our orthography, seedus, and in the oblique cases preserve the same long sound of the i: nomen they pronounce as we do, and preserve in the oblique cases the same long sound of the o. The Italians also, in their own language, pronounce doubled consonants as distinctly as the two most discordant mutes of their alphabet. Whatever, therefore, they may want of expressing the true harmony of the Latin language, they certainly avoid the most glaring and absurd faults in our manner of pronouncing it.

"It is a matter of curiosity to observe with what regularity we use these solecisms in the pronunciation of Latin. When the penultimate is accented, its vowel, if followed but by a single consonant, is always long, as in Dr. Forster's examples. When the antepenultimate is accented, its vowel is, without any regard to the requisite quantity, pronounced short, as in mirábile, frígidus; except the vowel of the penultimate be followed by a vowel, and then the vowel of the antepenultimate is with as little regard to true quantity pronounced long, as in maneo, redeat, odium, imperium. Quantity is, however, vitiated to make i short even in this case, as in oblivio, vinea, virium. The only difference we make in pronunciation between vinea and venia is, that to the vowel of the first syllable of the former, which ought to be long, we give a short sound; to that of the latter, which ought to be short, we give the same sound, but lengthened. U accented is always, before a single consonant, pronounced long, as in humerus, fugiens. Before two consonants no vowel sound is ever made long, except that of the diphthong au; so that, whenever a doubled consonant occurs, the preceding syllable is short.* Unaccented vowels we treat with no more ceremony in Latin than in our own language." Essay upon the Harmony of Language, page 224. Printed for Robson, 1774.

This, it must be owned, is a very just state of the case; but though the Latin quantity is thus violated, it is not, as this writer observes in the first part of the quotation, merely as chance directs, but, as he afterwards observes, regularly, and, he might have added, according to the analogy of English pronunciation, which, it may be observed, has a genius of its own; and which, if not so well adapted to the pronunciation of Greek and Latin as some other modern languages, has as fixed and settled rules for pronouncing them as any other.

The learned and ingenious author next proceeds to show the advantages of pronouncing our vowels so as to express the Latin quantity. "We have reason to suppose," says he, "that our usual accentuation of Latin, however it may want of many elegancies in the pronunciation of the Augustan age, is yet sufficiently just to give with tolerable accuracy that part of the general harmony of the language of which accent is the efficient. We have also pretty full information from the poets what syllables ought to have a long, and what a short quantity. To preserve, then, in our pronunciation, the true harmony of the language, we have only to take care to give the vowels a long sound or a short sound, as the quantity may require; and, when doubled consonants occur, to pronounce each distinctly." Ibid. page 228.†

In answer to this plea for alteration, it may be observed, that if this mode of pronouncing Latin be that of foreign nations, and were really so superior to our own, we certainly must perceive it in the pronunciation of foreigners, when we visit them, or they us: but I think I may appeal to the experience of every one who has had an opportunity of making the experiment, that, so far from the superiority being on the side of the foreign pronunciation, it seems much inferior to our own. I am aware of the power of habit, and of its being able, on many occasions, to make the worse appear the better reason; but if the harmony of the Latin language depended so much on a preservation of the quantity as many pretend, this harmony would surely overcome the bias we have to our own pronunciation; especially if our own were really so destructive of harmony as it is said to be. Till, therefore, we have a more accurate idea of the nature of quantity, and of that beauty and harmony of which it is said to be the efficient in the pronunciation of Latin, we ought to preserve a pronunciation which has naturally sprung up in our own soil, and is congenial to our native language. Besides, an alteration of this kind would be attended with so much dispute and uncertainty as must make it highly impolitic to attempt it.

The analogy, then, of our own language being the rule for pronouncing the learned languages, we shall have little occasion for any other directions for the pronunciation of the Greek and Latin proper names, than such as are given for the pronunciation of English words. The general rules are followed almost without exception. The first and most obvious powers of the letters are adopted, and there is scarcely any difficulty but in the position of the accent; and this depends so much on the quantity of the vowels, that we need only inspect a dictionary to find the quantity of the penultimate vowel, and this determines the accent of all the Latin words; and, it may be added, of almost all Greek words likewise.‡ Now, in our pronunciation of Latin words, whatever be the quantity of the first syllable in a word of two syllables, we always place the accent on it: but in words of more syllables, if the penultimate be long, we place the accent on that; and if short we accent the antepenultimate.

The Rules of the Latin Accentuation are comprised in a clear and concise manner by Sanctius within four hexameters:

Accentum in se ipsâ monosyllaba dictio ponit.
Exacuit sedem dissyllabon omne priorem.
Ex tribus, extollit primam penultima curta:
Extollit seipsam quando est penultima longa.

These rules I have endeavored to express in English verse:

Each monosyllable has stress of course;
Words of two syllables the first enforce:
A syllable that's long, and last but one,
Must have the accent upon that or none;
But if this syllable be short, the stress
Must on the last but two its force express.

The only difference that seems to obtain between the pronunciation of the Greek and Latin languages, is that, in the Latin, ti and si, preceded by an accent, and followed by another vowel forming an improper diphthong, are pronounced as in English, like sh or zh, as natio, nation; persuasio, persuasion, &c.; and that, in the Greek, the same letters retain their pure sound, as φιλαντία, ἀγνωσία, προβατιον, κ. τ. λ.§ This difference is observable in those words where the accent is on the preceding vowel, as in natio, facio, &c.; but not when the accent follows the t, and is on the following vowel, as in satietas, societas, &c., why should we suppose any other mode of pronunciation would have been adopted by the Goths in their pronouncing the Greek? Now no rule of pronunciation is more uniform in the Greek language than that which places an acute on the iota at the end of words, when this letter is succeeded by a long vowel; and, consequently, if the accent be preserved upon the proper letter, it is impossible the preceding t and s should go into the sound of sh; why, therefore, may we not suppose that the very frequent accentuation of the penultimate i before a final vowel preserved the preceding τ from going into the sound of sh, as it was a difference of accentuation that occasioned this impure sound of t in the Latin language? for though i at the end of words, when followed by a long vowel, or a vowel once long and afterwards contracted, had always the accent on it in Greek, in Latin the accent was always on the preceding syllable in words of this termination; and hence seems to have arisen the corruption of t in the Gothic pronunciation of the Latin language.

It is highly probable, that in Lucian's time the Greek τ, when followed by i and another vowel, had not assumed the sound of σ; for the Sigma would not have failed to accuse him of a usurpation of her powers, as he had done of her character; and if we have preserved the τ pure in this situation when we pronounce Greek, it is, perhaps, rather to be placed to the preserving power of the accented i in so great a number of words, than any adherence to the ancient rules of pronunciation; which invariably affirm that the consonants had but one sound; unless we except the γ before γ, κ, χ, ξ; as ἄγγελος, ἀγκυρα, ἀγχίστα, κ. τ. λ. where the γ is sounded like ν: but this, says Henry Stephens, is an error of the copyists, who have a little extended the bottom of the ν, and made a γ of it: for, says he, it is ridiculous to suppose that ν was changed into γ, and at the same time that γ should be pronounced like ν.

* This corruption of the true quantity is not, however, peculiar to the English; for Beza complains in his country: Hinc enim fit ut in Græca oratione vel nullum, vel prorsus corruptum numerum intelligas, dum multæ breves producuntur, et contrâ plurimæ longæ corripiuntur. Beza de Germ. Pron. Græcæ Linguæ, p. 50.

† By what this learned author has observed of our vicious pronunciation of the vowels, by the long and short sound of them, and from the instances he has given, he must mean that length and shortness which arises from extending and contracting them, independently of the obstruction which two consonants are supposed to occasion in forming the long quantity. Thus we are to pronounce manus as if written and divided into man-nus; and pannus as if written pay-nus, or as we always hear the word panis (bread); for in this sound of pannus there seems to be no necessity for pronouncing the two consonants distinctly or separately, which he seems to mean by distinctly, because the quantity is shown by the long sound of the vowel: but if by distinctly he means separately, that is, as if what is called in French the schéva or mute e were to follow the first consonant, this could not be done without adding a syllable to the word; and the word pannus would in that case certainly have three syllables, as if written pan-eh-nus.

‡ That is, in the general pronunciation of Greek; for, let the written accent be placed where it will, the quantitative accent, as it may be called, follows the analogy of the Latin.

§ "The Greek language," says the learned critic, "was happy in not being understood by the Goths, who would as certainly have corrupted the t in αἰτία, ὠτίον, &c. into αἰσία, ὠσ'ον, &c. as they did the Latin "motio and doceo into mo:nio and dosheo."* This, however, may be questioned; for if in Latin words this impure sound of t take place only in ference, however, with very few exceptions, does not extend to proper names; which, coming to us through, and being mingled with, the Latin, fall into the general rule. In the same manner, though in Greek it was an established maxim, that if the last syllable was long, the accent could scarcely be higher than the penultimate; yet in our pronunciation of Greek, and particularly of proper names, the Latin analogy of the accent is adopted: and though the last syllable is long in Demosthènes, Aristophanes, Theramenes, and Deiphobe, yet, as the penultimate is short, the accent is placed on the antepenultimate, exactly as if they were Latin.*

* Ainsworth on the letter T.

As these languages have been long dead, they admit of no new varieties of accent like the living languages. The common accentuation of Greek and Latin may be seen in Lexicons and Graduses; and where the ancients indulged a variety, and the moderns are divided in their opinions about the most classical accentuation of words, it would be highly improper, in a work intended for general use, to enter into the thorny disputes of the learned; and it may truly be said, in the rhyming adage,

When doctors disagree,
Disciples then are free.

This, however, has not been entirely neglected. Where there has been any considerable diversity of accentuation among our prosodists, I have consulted the best authorities, and have sometimes ventured to decide: though, as Labbe says, "Sed his de rebus, ut aliis multis, malo doctiorum judicium expectare, quam meam in medium proferre sententiam."

But the most important object of the present work is settling the English quantity, (see Rules 20, 21, 22,) with which we pronounce Greek and Latin proper names, and the sounds of some of the consonants. These are points in a state of great uncertainty, and are to be settled, not so much by a deep knowledge of the dead languages, as by a thorough acquaintance with the analogies and general usage of our own tongue. These must, in the nature of things, enter largely into the pronunciation of a dead language; and it is from an attention to these that the author hopes he has given to the public a work not entirely unworthy of their acceptance.

On the contrary, Scaliger says, that where we find a v before these letters, as ανκυρα, it is an error of the copyists, who imagined they better expressed the pronunciation by this letter, which, as Vossius observes, should seem to demand something particular and uncommon.

It is reported of Scaliger, that when he was accosted by a Scotchman in Latin, he begged his pardon for not understanding him, as he had never learned the Scotch language. If this were the case with the pronunciation of a Scotchman, which is so near that of the continent, what would he have said to the Latin pronunciation of an Englishman? I take it, however, that this diversity is greatly exaggerated.

* This, however, was contrary to the general practice of the Romans; for Victorinus in his Grammar says, Græca nomina, si iisdem literis proferuntur, (Latine versa) Græcos accentus habebunt: nam cum dicimus Thyas, Nais, acutum habebit posterior accentum; et cum Themistio, Calypso, Theano, ultimam circumflecti videbimus, quod utrumque Latinus sermo non patitur, nisi admodum raro. "If Greek nouns turned into Latin are pronounced with the same letters, they have the Greek accent: for when we say, Thyas, Nais, the latter syllable has the acute accent; and when we pronounce Themistio, Calypso, Theano, we see the last syllable is circumflexed; neither of which is ever seen in Latin words, or very rarely."—Servius. Forster. Reply, page 31. Notes 32, bott.

RULES

FOR PRONOUNCING THE VOWELS OF

GREEK AND LATIN PROPER NAMES.

1. EVERY vowel with the accent on it at the end of a syllable is pronounced, as in English, with its first long open sound: thus Ca'to,* Philome'la, Ori'on, Pho'cion, Lu'cifer, &c., have the accented vowels sounded exactly as in the English words pa'per, me'tre, spi'der, no'ble, tu'tor, &c.

2. Every accented vowel not ending a syllable, but followed by a consonant, has the short sound as in English: thus Man'lius, Pen'theus, Pin'darus, Col'chis, Cur'tius, &c., have the short sound of the accented vowels, as in man'ner, plen'ty, prin'ter, col'lar, cur'few, &c.

3. Every final i, though unaccented, has the long open sound: thus the final i forming the genitive case, as in magis'tri, or the plural number, as in De'cii, has the long open sound, as in vi'al; and this sound we give to this vowel in this situation, because the Latin i final in genitives, plurals, and preterperfect tenses of verbs, is always long; and consequently, where the accented i is followed by i final, both are pronounced with the long diphthongal i, like the noun eye, as Achi'vi.†

4. Every unaccented i, ending a syllable not final, as that in the second of Alcibiades, the Hernici, &c., is pronounced like e, as if written Alcebiades, the Herneci, &c. So the last syllable but one of the Fabii, the Horatii, the Curiatii, &c., is pronounced as if written Fa-be-i, Ho-ra-she-i, Cu-re-a-she-i; and therefore, if the unaccented i and the diphthong æ conclude a word, they are both pronounced like e, as Harpyiæ, Har-py'e-e.

5. The diphthongs æ and œ, ending a syllable with the accent on it, are pronounced exactly like the long English e, as Cæsar, Œta, &c., as if written Cee'sar, E'ta, &c.; and like the short e, when followed by a consonant in the same syllable, as Dædalus, Œdipus, &c., pronounced as if written Deddalus, Eddipus, &c. The vowels ei are generally pronounced like long i.‡—For the vowels eu in final syllables, see the word IDOMENEUS; and for the ou in the same syllables, see the word ANTINOUS, and similar words, in the Terminational Vocabulary.

6. Y is exactly under the same predicament as i. It is long when ending an accented syllable, as Cy'rus; or when ending an unaccented syllable, if final, as Æ'gy, Æ'py, &c.; short when joined to a consonant, in the same syllable, as Lyc'idas; and sometimes long and sometimes short, when ending an initial syllable not under the accent, as Ly-cur'gus, pronounced with the first syllable like lie, a falsehood; and Lysimachus, with the first syllable like the first of legion; or nearly as if divided into Lys-im'a-chus, &c.

7. A, ending an unaccented syllable, has the same obscure sound as in the same situation in English words; but it is a sound bordering on the Italian a, or the a in fa-ther, as Dia'na, where the difference between the accented and unaccented a is palpable.

8. E final, either with or without the preceding consonant, always forms a distinct syllable, as Penelope, Hippocrene, Evoe, Amphitrite, &c. When any Greek or Latin word is Anglicised into this termination, by cutting off a syllable of the original, it becomes then an English word, and is pronounced according to our own analogy: thus, Acidalius, altered to Acidale, has the final e sunk, and is a word of three syllables only: Proserpine, from Proserpina, undergoes the same alteration. Thebes and Athens, derived from the Greek Θηβη and Αθηνη, and the Latin Thebæ and Athenæ, are perfectly Anglicised; the former into a monosyllable, and the latter into a dissyllable: and the Greek Κρητη and the Latin Creta have both sunk into the English monosyllable Crete: Hecate, likewise, pronounced in three syllables when Latin, and in the same number in the Greek word Εκατη, in English is universally contracted into two, by sinking the final e. Shakspeare seems to have begun, as he has now confirmed this pronunciation, by so adapting the word in Macbeth:

"Why, how now, Hecat'? you look angerly."—Act IV.

Perhaps this was no more than a poetical license in him; but the actors have adopted it in the songs in this tragedy:

"He-cate, He-cate, come away"——

And the play-going world, who form no small portion of what is called the better sort of people, have followed the actors in this word, and the rest of the world have followed them.

The Roman magistrate, named ædilis, is Anglicised by pronouncing it in two syllables, æ'dile. The capital of Sicily, Syracusæ, of four syllables, is made three in the English Syr'acuse; and the city of Tyrus, of two syllables, is reduced to a monosyllable in the English Tyre.

Rules for pronouncing the Consonants of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

9. C and g are hard before a, o, and u, as Cato, Comus, Cures, Galba, Gorgon, &c.; and soft before e, i, and y, as Cebes, Scipio, Scylla, Cinna, Geryon, Geta, Gillus, Gyges, Gymnosophistæ, &c.§

10. T, s, and c, before ia, ie, ii, io, iu, and eu, preceded by the accent, in Latin words, as in English, change into sh and zh, as Tatian, Statius, Portius, Portia, Socias, Caduceus, Accius, Helvetii, Mæsia, Hesiod, &c., pronounced Tushean, Stasheus, Porsheus, Porshea, Sosheas, Cadusheus, Aksheus, Helveshei, Mezhea, Hezheod, &c. But when the accent is on the first of the diphthongal vowels, the preceding consonant does not go into sh, but preserves its sound pure, as Miltiades, Antiates, &c.

11. T and s, in proper names, ending in tia, sia, cyon, and sion, preceded by the accent, change the t and s into sh and zh. Thus Phocion, Sicyon, and Cercyon, are pronounced exactly in our own analogy, as if written Phoshean, Sishean, and Sershean: Artemisia and Aspasia sound as if written Artemizhea and Aspazhea: Galatia, Aratia, Alotia, and Batia, as if written Galashea, Arashea, Aloshea, and Bashea: and if Atia, the town in Campania, is not so pronounced, it is to distinguish it from Asia, the eastern region of the world.

* The pronunciation of Cato, Plato, Cleopatra, &c. has been but lately adopted. Quin, and all the old dramatic school, used to pronounce the a in these and similar words like the a in father. Mr. Garrick, with great good sense, as well as good taste, brought in the present pronunciation, and the propriety of it has made it now universal.

† This is the true analogical pronunciation of this letter, when ending an accented syllable; but a most disgraceful affectation of foreign pronunciation has exchanged this full diphthongal sound for the meagre, squeezed sound of the French and Italian i, not only in almost every word derived from those languages, but in many which are purely Latin, as Faustina, Messalina, &c. Nay, words from the Saxon have been equally perverted, and we hear the i in Elfrida, Edwina, &c. turned into Elfreeda, Edweena, &c. It is true this is the sound the Romans gave to their i; but the speakers here alluded to are perfectly innocent of this, and do not pronounce it in this manner for its antiquity, but its novelty.

‡ See ELEGEIA, HYGEIA, &c. in the Terminational Vocabulary of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

[The author is inconsistent with himself as to the sound of ei. In the Terminational Dictionary (note on eia) he remarks that the ei should be pronounced like double e long. For this reason the accent has been placed, in the following pages, on the letter e in all cases of this kind. See ANTEIUS, &c. ED.]

§ That this general rule should be violated by smatterers in the learned languages, in such words as gymnastic, heterogeneous, &c., is not to be wondered at; but that men of real learning, who do not want to show themselves off to the vulgar by such inuendoes of their erudition, should give into this irregularity, is really surprising. We laugh at the pedantry of the age of James the First, where there is scarcely a page in any English book, that is not sprinkled with twenty Greek and Latin quotations; and yet do not see the similar pedantry of interlarding our pronunciation with Greek and Latin sounds; which may be affirmed to be a greater perversion of our language than the former. In the one case, the introduction of Greek and Latin quotations does not interfere with the English phraseology; but in the other the pronunciation is disturbed, and a motley jargon of sounds introduced, as inconsistent with true taste as it is with neatness and uniformity.

But the termination tion (of which there are not even twenty examples in proper names throughout the whole Greek and Latin languages) seems to preserve the t from going into sh, as the last remnant of a learned pronunciation; and to avoid, as much as possible, assimilating with so vulgar an English termination: thus, though Æsion, Jasion, Dionysion, change the s into z, as if written Æzion, Jazion, Dionizion, the z does not become zh; but Philistion, Gration, Eurytion, Dotion, Androtion, Hippotion, Iphition, Ornytion, Metion, Polytion, Stration, Sotion, Æantion, Pallantion, Ætion, Hippocration, and Amphyction, preserve the t in its true sound; Hephæstion, however, from the frequency of appearing with Alexander, has deserted the small class of his Greek companions, and joined the English multitude, by rhyming with question; and Tatian and Theodotion seem perfectly Anglicised. With very, very few exceptions, therefore, it may be concluded, that Greek and Latin proper names are pronounced alike, and that both of them follow the analogy of English pronunciation.

12. Ch. These letters before a vowel are always pronounced like k, as Chabrias, Cholchis, &c.; but when they come before a mute consonant at the beginning of a word, as in Chthonia, they are mute, and the word is pronounced as if written Thonia. Words beginning with Sche, as Schedius, Scheria, &c., are pronounced as if written Skedius, Skeria, &c.; and c before n in the Latin prænomen Cneus or Cnæus is mute; so in Cnopus, Cnosus, &c., and before t in Cteatus, and g before n in Gnidus; pronounced Nopus, Nosus, Teatus, and Nidus.

13. At the beginning of Greek words we frequently find the uncombinable consonants mn, tm, &c., as Mnemosyne, Mnesidamus, Mneus, Mnesteus, Tmolus, &c. These are to be pronounced with the first consonant mute, as if written Nemosyne, Nesidamus, Neus, Nesteus, Molus, &c., in the same manner as we pronounce the words bdellium, pneumatic, gnomon, mnemonics, &c., without the initial consonant. The same may be observed of the c hard, like k, when it comes before t; as Ctesiphon, Ctesippus, &c. Some of these words we see sometimes written with an e or i after the first consonant, as Menesteus, Timolus, &c., and then the initial consonant is pronounced.

14. Ph, followed by a consonant, is mute, as Phthia, Phthinis, pronounced Thia, Thiotis, in the same manner as the naturalized Greek word phthisic, pronounced tisic.

15. Ps: p is mute also in this combination, as in Psyche, Psammetichus, &c., pronounced Syke, Sammeticus, &c.

16. Pt: p is mute in words beginning with these letters when followed by a vowel, as Ptolemy, Pterilas, &c., pronounced Tolemy, Terilas, &c.; but when followed by l, the t is heard, as in Ptepolemus: for, though we have no words of our own with these initial consonants, we have many words that end with them, and they are certainly pronounced. The same may be observed of the z in Zmilaces.

17. The letters s, x, and z, require but little observation, being generally pronounced as in pure English words. It may, however, be remarked, that s, at the end of words, preceded by any of the vowels but e, has its pure hissing sound; as mas, dis, os, mus, &c.; but when e precedes, it goes into the sound of z; as pes, Thersites, vates, &c. It may also be observed, that when it ends a word preceded by r or n, it has the sound of z. Thus the letter s in mens, Mars, mors, &c., has the same sound as in the English words hens, stars, wars, &c. X, when beginning a word or syllable, is pronounced like z; as Xerxes, Xenophon, &c., are pronounced Zerkzes, Zenophon, &c. Z is uniformly pronounced as in English words: thus the z in Zeno and Zeugma is pronounced as we hear it in zeal, zone, &c.

Rules for ascertaining the English Quantity of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

18. It may at first be observed, that in words of two syllables, with but one consonant in the middle, whatever be the quantity of the vowel in the first syllable in Greek or Latin, we always make it long in English: thus Crates, the philosopher, and crates, a hurdle; decus, honor, and dedo, to give up; ovo, to triumph, and ovum, an egg; Numa, the legislator, and Numen, the divinity, have the first vowel always sounded equally long by an English speaker, although in Latin the first vowel in the first word of each of these pairs is short.*

19. On the contrary, words of three syllables, with the accent on the first, and with but one consonant after the first syllable, have that syllable pronounced short, let the Greek or Latin quantity be what it will: thus regulus and remora, mimicus and minium, are heard with the first vowel short in English pronunciation, though the first words of each pair have their first syllables long in Latin: and the u in fumigo and fugito is pronounced long in both words, though in Latin the last u is short. This rule is never broken but when the first syllable is followed by e or i, followed by another vowel: in this case the vowel in the first syllable is long, except that vowel be i: thus lamia, genius, Libya, docco, cupio, have the accent on the first syllable, and this syllable is pronounced long in every word but Libya, though in the original it is equally short in all.

20. It must have frequently occurred to those who instruct youth, that though the quantity of the accented syllable of long proper names has been easily conveyed, yet that the quantity of the preceding unaccented syllables has occasioned some embarrassment. An appeal to the laws of our own language would soon have removed the perplexity, and enabled us to pronounce the initial unaccented syllables with as much decision as the others. Thus every accented antepenultimate vowel but u, even when followed by one consonant only, is, in our pronunciation of Latin, as well as in English, short: thus fabula, separo, diligo, nobilis, cucumis, have the first vowels pronounced as in the English words capital, celebrate, simony, solitude, luculent, in direct opposition to the Latin quantity, which makes every antepenultimate vowel in all these words but the last long; and this we pronounce long, though short in Latin. But if a semi-consonant diphthong succeed, then every such vowel is long but i, in our pronunciation of both languages; and Euganeus, Eugenia, filius, folium, dubia, have the vowel in the antepenultimate syllable pronounced exactly as in the English words satiate, menial, delirious, notorious, penurious; though they are all short in Latin but the i, which we pronounce short, though in the Latin it is long.

21. The same rule of quantity takes place in those syllables which have the secondary accent: for, as we pronounce lamentation, demonstration, diminution, domination, luculration, with every vowel in the first syllable short but u, so we pronounce the same vowels in the same manner in lamentatio, demonstratio, diminutio, dominatio, and lucubratio: but if a semi-consonant diphthong succeed the secondary accent, as in Aricvistus, Heliodorus, Gabinianus, Herodianus, and Volusianus, every vowel preceding the diphthong is long but i; just as we should pronounce these vowels in the English words amiability, mediatorial, propitiation, excoriation, centuriator, &c.

22. But to reduce these rules into a smaller compass, that they may be more easily comprehended and remembered, it may be observed, that, as we always shorten every antepenultimate vowel with the primary accent but u, unless followed by a semi-consonant diphthong, though this antepenultimate vowel is often long in Greek and Latin, as Æschylus, Æschines, &c., and the antepenultimate i, even though it be followed by such a diphthong, as Eleusinia, Ocrisia, &c.—so we shorten the first syllable of Æsculapius, Ænobarbus, &c., because the first syllable of both these words has the secondary accent: but we pronounce the same vowels long in Æthiopia, Ægialeus, Haliartus, &c., because this accent is followed by a semi-consonant diphthong.

23. This rule sometimes holds good where a mute and liquid intervene, and determines the first syllable of Adrian, Adriatic, &c.; to be long like ay, and not short like add: and it is on this analogical division of the words, so little understood or attended to, that a perfect and a consistent pronunciation of them depends. It is this analogy that determines the first a to be long in stupidus, and the y short in clypea, though both are short in the Latin; and the o in the first syllable of Coriolanus, which is short in Latin, to be long in English.

24. The necessity of attending to the quantity of the vowel in the accented syllable has sometimes produced a division of words in the following Vocabulary that does not seem to convey the actual pronunciation. Thus the words Sulpitius, Anicium, Artemisium, &c., being divided into Sul-pit'i-us, A-nic'i-um, Ar-te-mis'i-um, &c., we fancy the syllable after the accent deprived of a consonant closely united with it in sound, and which, from such a union, derives an aspirated sound equivalent to sh. But as the sound of t, c, or s, in this situation, is so generally understood, it was thought more eligible to divide the words in this manner, than into Sul-pi'ti-us, A-ni'ci-um, Ar-te-mi'si-um, as in the latter mode the i wants its shortening consonant, and might, by some speakers, be pronounced, as it generally is in Scotland, like ee. The same may be observed of c and g when they end a syllable, and are followed by e or i, as in Ac-e-ra'tus, Ac-i-da'li-a, Tig-el-li'nus, Teg'y-ra, &c., where the c and g ending a syllable, we at first sight think them to have their hard sound; but, by observing the succeeding vowel, we soon perceive them to be soft, and only made to end a syllable in order to determine the shortness of the vowel which precedes.

25. The general rule, therefore, of quantity, indicated by the syllabication adopted in the Vocabulary, is, that when a consonant ends a syllable, the vowel is always short, whether the accent be on it or not; and that when a vowel ends a syllable with the accent on it, it is always long: that the vowel u, when it ends a syllable, is long whether the accent be on it or not; and that the vowel i, (3,) (4,) when it ends a syllable without the accent, is pronounced like e; but if the syllable be final, it has its long open sound, as if the accent were on it; and the same may be observed of the letter y.

Rules for placing the Accent of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

26. Words of two syllables, either Greek or Latin, whatever be the quantity in the original, have, in English pronunciation, the accent on the first syllable: and if a single consonant come between two vowels, the consonant goes to the last syllable, and the vowel in the first is long; as Cato, Ceres, Comus, &c.

*The only word occurring to me at present, where this rule is not observed, is canon, a rule, which is always pronounced like the word cannon, a piece of ordnance.

27. Polysyllables, adopted whole from the Greek or Latin into English, have generally the accent of the Latin: that is, if the penultimate be long, the accent is on it, as Severus, Democedes, &c.; if short, the accent is on the antepenultimate, as Demosthenes, Aristophanes, Posthumus, &c. See Introduction.

28. When Greek or Latin proper names are Anglicised, either by an alteration of the letters, or by cutting off the latter syllables, the accent of the original, as in appellatives under the same predicament, is transferred nearer to the beginning of the word. Thus Proserpina has the accent on the second syllable; but when altered to Proserpine, it transfers the accent to the first. The same may be observed of Homerus, Virgilius, Horatius, &c. when Anglicised to Homer, Virgil, Horace, &c.

29. As it is not very easy, therefore, so it is not necessary to decide where doctors disagree. When reasons lie deep in Greek and Latin etymology, the current pronunciation will be followed, let the learned do all they can to hinder it: thus, after Hyperion has been accented by our best poets, according to our own analogy, with the accent on the antepenultimate, as Shakspeare:

"Hype'rion's curls, the front of Jove himself."—Hamlet.

"————that was to this Hype'rion to a satyr." Ibid.

"————next day after dawn,
Doth rise and help Hype'rion to his horse."—Henry Vth.

So Cooke, in his translation of Hesiod's Theogony, follows the accentuation of Shakspeare:

"Hyperion and Japhet, brothers, join:
Thea and Rhea of this ancient line
Descend; and Themis boasts the source divine."

"The fruits of Thia and Hyperion rise,
And with refulgent lustre light the skies."

After this established pronunciation, I say, how hopeless, as well as useless, would it be to attempt the penultimate accentuation, which yet ought undoubtedly to be preserved in reading or speaking Greek or Latin compositions; but, in reading or speaking English, must be left to those who would rather appear learned than judicious. But Acrion, Arion, Amphion, Echion, Orion, Ixion, Pandion, Asion, Alphion, Ærion, Ophion, Methion, Axion, Eion, Thlexion, and Sandion, preserve their penultimate accent invariably: while Ethalion, a word of the same form and origin, is pronounced with the accent on the antepenultimate, like Deucalion, and Pygmalion: and this, if I mistake not, is the common pronunciation of a ship in the British navy, so called from the name of one of the Argonauts, who accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece.

30. The same difficulty of deciding between common usage and classical propriety appears in words ending in ia, as Alexandria, Antiochia, Seleucia, Samaria, Iphigenia, and several others, which were pronounced by our ancestors, as appears from their poetry, according to our own analogy, with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable; and there is no doubt but every word of this form would have fallen into the same accentuation, if classical criticism had not stepped in and prevented it. A philosophical grammarian would be apt to think we are not much obliged to scholars for this interruption of the vernacular current of pronunciation; but, as there is so plausible a plea as that of reducing words to their original languages, and as a knowledge of these languages will always be an honorable distinction among men, it is strongly to be suspected that these words will not long continue in their plain, homespun English dress. This critical correction, however, seems to have come too late for some words, which, as Pope expresses it, have "slid into verse," and taken possession of our ears; and therefore, perhaps, the best way of disposing of them will be to consider them as the ancients did the quantity of certain doubtful syllables, and to pronounce them either way. Some, however, seem always to have preserved the accent of their original language, as Thalia and Sophia: but Iphigenia, Antiochia, Seleucia, and Samaria, have generally yielded to the English antepenultimate accent; and Erythia, Deidamia, Laodamia, Hippodamia, Apamia, Ilithyia, and Orithyia, from their seldom appearing in mere English composition, have not often been drawn aside into plain English pronunciation. The same may be observed of words ending in nicus, or nice: if they are compounded of the Greek νικη, the penultimate syllable is always long, and must have the accent, as Stratonicus, Berenice, &c.; if this termination be what is called a gentile, signifying a man by his country, the penultimate is short, and the accent is on the antepenultimate; as Macedonicus, Sardonicus, Britannicus, &c. See ANDRONICUS.

31. Thus we see many of these proper names are of dubious accentuation; and the authorities which may be produced on both sides sufficiently show us the inutility of criticising beyond a certain point. It is in these as in many English words: there are some which, if mispronounced, immediately show a want of education; and there are others which, though not pronounced in the most erudite manner, stamp no imputation of ignorance or illiteracy. To have a general knowledge, therefore, of the pronunciation of these words, seems absolutely necessary for those who would appear respectable in the more respectable part of society. Perhaps no people on earth are so correct in the accentuation of proper names as the learned among the English. The Port-Royal Grammar informs us, that, "notwithstanding all the rules that can be given, we are often under the necessity of submitting to custom, and of accommodating our pronunciation to what is received among the learned according to the country we are in." "So we pronounce," says the grammarian, "Aristo'bulus, Basi'lius, Ido'lium, with the accent on the antepenultimate, though the penultimate is long, because it is the custom: and, on the contrary, we pronounce Andre'as, ide'a, Mari'a, &c., with the accent on the penultimate, though it is short, because it is the custom of the most learned. The Italians," continues he, "place the accent on the penultimate of antonomasi'a, harmoni'a, philosophi'a, theologi'a, and similar words, according to the Greek accent, because, as Ricciolius observes, it is the custom of their country. Alvarez and Gretser think we ought always to pronounce them in this manner, though the custom, not only of Germany and Spain, but of all France, is against it: but Nebrissensis authorizes this last pronunciation, and says, that it is better to place the accent of these vowels on the antepenultimate syllable; which shows," concludes the grammarian, "that when we once depart from the ancient rules, we have but little certainty in practice, which is so different in different countries."

But however uncertain and desultory the accentuation of many words may be, it is a great satisfaction to a speaker to know that they are so. There is a wide difference between pronouncing words of this kind ignorantly and knowingly. A person who knows that scholars themselves differ in the pronunciation of these words can always pronounce with security: but one who is unacquainted with the state of the accent is not sure that he is right when he really is so, and always pronounces at his peril.

 It is hoped the candid peruser of this work will make allowances for an occasional error in dividing a syllable or placing an accent, when he reflects on the difficulty with which such a work must necessarily be attended. The author flatters himself, however, that such attention has been paid both to the compilation and the proofs, that the fewest errors imaginable have escaped him.*

PRONUNCIATION

INITIAL VOCABULARY.

 When a word is succeeded by a word printed in Italics, the latter word is merely to spell the former as it ought to be pronounced. Thus Abansheas is the true pronunciation of the preceding word Abantias: and so of the rest.

 The figures annexed to the words refer to the Rules prefixed to the work. Thus the figure 3 after Achœi refers to Rule the 3d, for the pronunciation of the final i; and the figure 4 after Abii refers to Rule the 4th, for the pronunciation of the unaccented i, not final: and so of the rest.

 When the letters Eng. are put after a word, it is to show that this word is the preceding word Anglicised. Thus Lu'can, Eng., is the Latin word Lucanus, changed into the English Lucan.

* Every a ending a syllable, with the accent upon it, is pronounced like the a in the English words fa-vor, ta-per, &c. See Rule the 1st, prefixed to this Vocabulary.

† Every unaccented a, whether initial, medial or final, ending a syllable, has an obscure sound, bordering on the a in father. See Rule the 7th, prefixed to this Vocabulary.

‡ Achabytos.—Ch, in this and all the subsequent words, have the sound of k. Thus, Achabytos, Achæa, Achates, &c., are pronounced as if written Akabytos, Akæa, Akates, &c. See Rule the 12th.

§ Æa.—This diphthong is merely ocular, for the a has no share in the sound, though it appears in the type. Indeed, as we pronounce the a, there is no middle sound between that letter and e, and therefore we have adopted the last vowel, and relinquished the first. This, among other reasons, makes it probable that the Greeks and Romans pronounced the a as we do in water, and the e as we hear it in where and there; the middle or mixt sound, then, would be like a in father, which was probably the sound they gave to this diphthong.

* Ægis.—This diphthong, though long in Greek and Latin, is in English pronunciation either long or short, according to the accent or position of it. Thus, if it immediately precedes the accent, as in Ægeus, or with the accent on it, before a single consonant, in a word of two syllables, it is long, as in Ægis; before two consonants it is short, as in Ægles; or before one only, if the accent be on the antepenultimate, as in Æropus.—For the exceptions to this rule, see Rule 22.

† One of the generals of Valentinian the Third; which, Labbe tells us, ought properly to be written Aëtius; that is, without the diphthong. We may observe, that as this word comes from the Greek, but is Latinized, it is pronounced with the t like sh, as if written Æshius; but the preceding word Ætion, being pure Greek, does not conform to this analogy.—See Rule the 11th and 29th.

‡ Alcinous.—There are no words more frequently mispronounced by a mere English scholar than those of this termination. By such a one we sometimes hear Alcinous and Antinous pronounced in three syllables, as if written Al-ci-nouz and Anti-nouz, rhyming with vows; but classical pronunciation requires that these vowels should form distinct syllables.

§ Aleius Campus.—

"Lest from this flying steed unrein'd, (as once Bellerophon, though from a lower clime,)
Dismounted, on th' Aleian field I fall,
Erroneous there to wander, and forlorn."
MILTON'S Par. Lost, b. vii. v. 17.

‖ Alexander.—This word is as frequently pronounced with the accent on the first as on the third syllable.

[¶ This word is accented, by the author, on the antepenult,

Alexan'dria, in the Terminational Dictionary, and among Scripture names. So likewise by Perry, and by Fulton and Knight.—Ed.]

* Amphigenia.—See Iphigenia, and rule 30, prefixed to this Vocabulary.

† This epithet, from the Greek αναδυω, emergens, signifying rising out of the water, is applied to the picture of Venus rising out of the sea, as originally painted by Apelles. I doubt not that some, who only hear this word, without seeing it written, suppose it to mean Anno Domini, the year of our Lord.

‡ Andronicus.—This word is uniformly pronounced by our prosodists with the penultimate accent; and yet so averse is an English ear to placing the accent on the penultimate i, that by all English scholars we hear it placed upon the antepenultimate syllable. That this was the pronunciation of this word in Queen Elizabeth's time, appears plainly from the tragedy of Titus Andronicus, said to be written by Shakspeare; in which we every where find the antepenultimate pronunciation adopted. It may indeed be questioned, whether Shakspeare's learning extended to a knowledge of the quantity of this Græco-Latin word; but, as Mr. Steevens has justly observed, there is a greater number of classical allusions in this play than are scattered over all the rest of the performances on which the seal of Shakspeare is indubitably fixed; and therefore it may be presumed that the author could not be ignorant of the Greek and Latin pronunciation of this word, but followed the received English pronunciation of his time, and which by all but professed scholars is still continued.—See Sophronicus.

* Antiochia.—For words of this termination, see IPHIGENIA, and No. 30 of the Rules prefixed to this Vocabulary.

† Apotheosis.—When we are reading Latin or Greek, this word ought to have the accent on the penultimate syllable; but in pronouncing English, we should accent the antepenultimate:

> Allots the prince of his celestial line
> An apothéosis and rites divine.—GARTH.

‡ Arbaces.—Lempriere, Gouldman, Gesner, and Littleton, accent this word on the first syllable, but Ainsworth and Holyoke on the second; and this is so much more agreeable to an English ear, that I should prefer it, though I have, out of respect to authorities, inserted the other, that the reader may choose which he pleases. Labbe has not got this word.

§ Arbela, the city of Assyria, where the decisive battle was fought between Alexander and Darius, and the city in Palestine of that name, have the accent on the penultimate; but Arbela, a town in Sicily, has the accent on the antepenultimate syllable.

‖ Archidamus.—Ainsworth, Gouldman, Littleton, and Holyoke, place the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of this word, but Lempriere and Labbe on the penultimate. I have followed Lempriere and Labbe, though, in my opinion, wrong; for, as every word of this termination has the antepenultimate accent, as Polydamas, Theodamas, &c., I know not why this should be different. Though Labbe tells us, that the learned are of his opinion.

¶ Areopagus.—Labbe tells us, that the penultimate syllable of this word is beyond all controversy short—quidquid nonnulli in tantâ luce etiamnùm cæcutiant.—Some of these blind men are, Gouldman, Holyoke and Littleton;—but Lempriere and Ainsworth, the best authorities, agree with Labbe.

 Argives.—I have observed a strong propensity in schoolboys to pronounce the g in these words hard, as in the English word give. This is, undoubtedly, because their masters do so; and they will tell us, that the Greek gamma should always be pronounced hard in the words from that language. What, then, must we alter that long catalogue of words where this letter occurs, as in Genesis, genius, Diogenes, Ægyptus, &c.? —The question answers itself.

* Aristob/ulus, Perry.

† Arsaces.—Gouldman, Lempriere, Holyoke, and Labbe, accent this word on the first syllable, and unquestionably not without classical authority; but Ainsworth, and a still greater authority, general usage, have, in my opinion, determined the accent of this word on the second syllable.

‡ Artemis.—

> "The sisters to Apollo tune their voice,
> And, Artemis, to thee, whom darts rejoice."
> COOKE'S Hesiod. Theog. v. 17.

§ Artemita.—Ainsworth places the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of this word; but Lempriere, Gouldman, and Holyoke, more correctly, in my opinion, on the penultimate.

¶ Atrebates.—Ainsworth accents this word on the antepenultimate syllable; but Lempriere, Gouldman, Holyoke, and Labbe, on the penultimate; and this is, in my opinion, the better pronunciation.

* Bellerus.—All our lexicographers unite in giving this word the antepenultimate accent: but Milton seems to have sanctioned the penultimate, as much more agreeable to English ears, in his Lycidas:

"Or whether thou, to our moist vows denied, Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old."

Though it must be acknowledged that Milton has in this word deserted the classical pronunciation, yet his authority is sufficient to make us acquiesce in his accentuation in the above-mentioned passage.

† Bianor.—Lempriere accents this word on the first syllable; but Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman, and Holyoke, on the second; and these agree with Virgil, Ecl. ix. v. 60.

‡ Britones.—Labbe tells us that this word is sometimes pronounced with the penultimate accent, but more frequently with the antepenultimate.

* Candace.—Lempriere, Labbe, and Ainsworth, accent this word on the first syllable, but Gouldman and Holyoke on the second; and I am much mistaken if the general ear has not sanctioned this latter pronunciation, and given it the preference.

Cle-op′a-ter
Cle-o-pa′tra‖

* Chea.—The ch in this, and all words from the Greek and Latin, must be pronounced like k.

† Charmione.—Dryden, in his tragedy of All for Love, has Anglicised this word into Charmion;—the ch pronounced as in charm.

† Chrysaor.—Then started out, when you began to bleed,
The great Chrysaor, and the gallant steed.
Cooke's Hesiod. Theog.

§ Cleomenes.—There is an unaccountable caprice in Dryden's accentuation of this word, in opposition to all prosody; for through the whole tragedy of this title he places the accent on the penultimate instead of the antepenultimate syllable.

‖ Cleopatra.—The learned editor of Labbe tells us this word ought to be pronounced with the accent on the antepenultimate, Cle-op′a-tra, though the penultimate accentuation, he says, is the more common.

* Cnacadium.—C before n, in this and the succeeding words, is mute; and they must be pronounced as if written Nacadium, Nacalis, &c.

† Collina.—Lempriere accents this word on the antepenultimate; but Ainsworth, Gouldman, and Holyoke, more properly, on the penultimate.

‡ Colotes.—Ainsworth and Lempriere accent this word on the antepenultimate syllable; but Labbe, Gouldman, and Holyoke, more agreeably to the general ear, on the penultimate.

* See IPHIGENIA.—

"Neptune, who shakes the earth, his daughter gave, Cymopolia, to reward the brave."

COOKE'S Hesiod. Theog. v. 1132.

† Cytherea.—

"Behold a nymph arise, divinely fair,
Whom to Cythera first the surges bear;
And Aphrodite, from the foam, her name,
Among the race of gods and men the same:
And Cytherea from Cythera came."

COOKE'S Hesiod. Theog. v. 299.

* Erythea.—
"Chrysaor, Love the guide, Callirŏe led,
Daughter of Ocean, to the genial bed,
Whence Geryon sprung, fierce with his triple head;
Whom Hercules laid breathless on the ground
In Erythea, which the waves surround."
COOKE'S Hesiod. Theog. v. 523.

† Eumenes.—It is not a little surprising that so elegant a writer as Hughes should, throughout the whole tragedy of the Siege of Damascus, accent this word on the penultimate syllable; especially as there is not a single proper name, of more than two syllables, in the Greek or Latin languages, of this termination, which has the penultimate syllable long. Lee has done the same in the tragedy of Alexander, which would lead us to suppose there is something naturally repugnant to an English ear in the antepenultimate accentuation of these words, and something agreeable in the penultimate.

‡ Euthalia.—Labbe observes, that this word does not come from the muse Thalia, as some suppose, but from the masculine Euthalius, as Eulatia, Eumenia, Eustolia, Eutropia, Emmelia, &c., which are professedly accented on the antepenultimate.—See Rule 29.

* Garganus.—
"And high Garganus, on the Apulian plain,
Is mark'd by sailors from the distant main."
WILKIE, Epigoniad.

† Granicus.—As Alexander's passing the river Granicus is a common subject of history, poetry, and painting, it is not wonderful that the common ear should have given into a pronunciation of this word more agreeable to English analogy than the true classical accent on the penultimate syllable. The accent on the first syllable is now so fixed, as to make the other pronunciation savor of pedantry.—See ANDRONICUS.

‡ Hegemon.—Gouldman and Holyoke accent this word on the antepenultimate syllable, but Labbe and Lempriere, more classically, on the penultimate.

§ Heliogabalus.—This word is accented on the penultimate syllable by Labbe and Lempriere; but, in my opinion more agreeably to the general ear, by Ainsworth, Gouldman and Holyoke, on the antepenultimate.

|| Heraclitus.—This name of the weeping philosopher is so frequently contrasted with that of Democritus, the laughing philosopher, that we are apt to pronounce both with the same accent; but all our prosodists are uniform in giving the antepenultimate accent to the latter, and the penultimate to the former word.

* Hippocrene.—Nothing can be better established than the pronunciation of this word in four syllables according to its original; and yet such is the license of English poets, that they not unfrequently contract it to three. Thus Cooke, Hesiod. Theog. v. 9.

"And now to Hippocrene resort the fair;
Or, Olmius, to thy sacred spring repair."

And a late translator of the Satires of Persius:

"Never did I so much as sip,
Or wet with Hippocrene a lip."

This contraction is inexcusable, as it tends to embarrass pronunciation, and lower the language of poetry.

† Hybreas.—Lempriere accents this word on the penultimate syllable; but Labbe, Gouldman, and Holyoke, more properly, on the antepenultimate.

‡ Iapetus.—"Son of Iäpetus, o'er-subtle, go,
And glory in thy artful theft below."
Cooke's Hesiod.

§ Idea.—This word, as a proper name, I find in no lexicographer but Lempriere. The English appellative, signifying an image in the mind, has uniformly the accent on the second syllable, as in the Greek ἰδέα, in opposition to the Latin, which we generally follow in other cases, and which, in this word, has the penultimate short, in Ainsworth, Labbe, and our best prosodists; and, according to this analogy, idea ought to have the accent on the first syllable, and that syllable short, as the first of idiot. But when this word is a proper name, as the daughter of Dardanus, I should suppose it ought to fall into the general analogy of pronouncing Greek names, not by accent, but by quantity; and, therefore, that it ought to have the accent on the first syllable; and, according to our own analogy, that syllable ought to be short, unless the penultimate in the Greek is a diphthong, and then, according to general usage, it ought to have the accent.

‖ Idomeneus.—The termination of nouns in eus was, among the ancients, sometimes pronounced in two syllables, and sometimes, as a diphthong, in one. Thus Labbe tells us, that Achilleüs, Agyleüs, Phalareüs, Apsirteüs, are pronounced commonly in four syllables, and Nereüs, Orpheüs, Porteüs, Tereüs, in three, with the penultimate syllable short in all; but that these words, when in verse, have generally the diphthong preserved in one syllable:

"Eumenidum veluti demens videt agmina Pentheus." Virg.

He observes, however, that the Latin poets very frequently dissolved the diphthong into two syllables:

"Naiadum cœtu, tantum non Orpheüs Hebrum Pœnaque respectus, et nunc manet Orpheüs in te."

The best rule, therefore, that can be given to an English reader is, to pronounce words of this termination always with the vowels separated, except an English poet, in imitation of the Greeks, should preserve the diphthong; but, in the present word, I should prefer I-dom/e-neus to I dom-e-ne/us, whether in verse or prose.

* See IDOMENEUS.

† Imaus.—All our prosodists make the penultimate syllable of this word short, and, consequently, accent it on the antepenultimate; but Milton, by a license he was allowed to take, accents it on the penultimate syllable:

"As when a vulture on Imaüs bred,
Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds."

‡ Iphigenia.—The antepenultimate syllable of this word had been in quiet possession of the accent for more than a century, till some Greeklings of late have attempted to place the stress on the penultimate, in compliment to the original ἰφιγένεια. If we ask our innovators on what principles they pronounce this word with the accent on the ι, they answer, because the i stands for the diphthong ει, which, being long, must necessarily have the accent on it: but it may be replied, this was indeed the case in the Latin language, but not in the Greek, where we find a thousand long penultimates without the accent. It is true, one of the vowels which composed a diphthong in Greek, when this diphthong was in the penultimate syllable, generally had an accent on it, but not invariably; for a long penultimate syllable did not always attract the accent in Greek as it did in Latin. An instance of this, among thousands, is that famous line of dactyles in Homer's Odyssey, expressing the tumbling down of the stone of Sisyphus:

"Αὖτις ἔπειτα πέδονδε κυλίνδετο λᾶας ἀναιδής."
Odyss. b. 11.

Another striking instance of the same accentuation appears in the two first verses of the Iliad:

"Μῆνιν ἄειδε Θεὰ Πηληϊάδεω, Ἀχιλῆος Οὐλομένην, ἣ μυρί' Ἀχαιοῖς ἄλγε ἔθηκη."

I know it may be said that the written accents we see on Greek words are of no kind of authority, and that we ought always to give accent to penultimate long quantity, as the Latins did. Not here to enter into a dispute about the authority of the written accents, the nature of the acute, and its connexion with quantity, which has divided the learned of Europe for so many years—till we have a clearer idea of the nature of the human voice, and the properties of speaking sounds, which alone can clear the difficulty—for the sake of uniformity, perhaps it were better to adopt the prevailing mode of pronouncing Greek proper names like the Latin, by making the quantity of the penultimate syllable the regulator of the accent, though contrary to the genius of Greek accentuation, which made the ultimate syllable its regulator; and, if this syllable was long, the accent could never rise higher than the penultimate. Perhaps in language, as in laws, it is not of so much importance that the rules of either should be exactly right, as that they should be certainly and easily known;—so the object of attention in the present case is not so much what ought to be done, as what actually is done;—and, as pedantry will always be more pardonable than illiteracy, if we are in doubt about the prevalence of custom, it will always be safer to lean to the side of Greek or Latin than of our own language.

§ Iphimedia.—This and the foregoing word have the accent on the same syllable, but for what reason cannot be easily conceived. That Iphigenia, having the diphthong ει in its penultimate syllable, should have the accent on that syllable, though not the soundest, is at least a plausible reason; but why should our prosodists give the same accent to the i in Iphimedia? which, coming from ιφι and μεδέω, has no such pretensions. If they say it has the accent in the Greek word, it may be answered, this is not esteemed a sufficient reason for placing the accent in Iphigenia; besides, it is giving up the sheet-anchor of modern prosodists, the quantity, as the regulator of accent. We know it was an axiom in Greek prosody, that, when the last syllable was long by nature, the accent could not rise beyond the penultimate; but we know, too, that this axiom is abandoned in Demosthenes, Aristoteles, and a thousand other words. The only reason, therefore, that remains for the penultimate accentuation of this word, is, that this syllable is long in some of the best poets. Be it so. Let those who have more learning and leisure than I have find it out. In the interim, as this may perhaps be a long one, I must recur to my advice under the last word; though Ainsworth has, in my opinion, very properly left the penultimate syllable of both these words short, yet those who affect to be thought learned will always find their account in departing, as far as possible, from the analogy of their own language in favor of Greek and Latin.

With Atropos both men and gods obey."

† Lasthenia.—All the prosodists I have consulted, except Ainsworth, accent this word on the penultimate syllable; and, though English analogy would prefer the accent on the antepenultimate, we must necessarily yield to such a decided superiority of votes for the penultimate in a word so little Anglicised by use.—See IPHIGENIA.

‡ Leonatus.—In the accentuation of this word I have followed Labbe and Lempriere: the former of whom says—Quanquam de hac voce amplius cogitandum cum eruditis viris existimem. Th[illegible], then, these learned men have considered this word, I think we may be allowed to consider it as formed from the Latin leo and natus, lion-born, and, as the a in natus is long, no shadow of reason can be given why it should not have the accent. This is the accentuation constantly given to it in the play of Cymbeline, and is, in my opinion, the best.

§ Lucia.—Labbe cries out loudly against those who accent this word on the penultimate, which, as a Latin word, ought to have the accent on the antepenultimate syllable. If once, says he, we break through rules, why should we not pronounce Ammia, Anastasia, Cecilia, Leocadia, Natalia, &c., with the accent on the penultimate likewise?—This ought to be a warning against our pronouncing the West-India island St. Lu'cia as we sometimes hear it—St. Luci'a.

* Lupercal.—This word is so little interwoven with our language, that it ought to have its true Latin accent on the penultimate syllable. But wherever the antepenultimate accent is adopted in verse, as in Shakspeare's Julius Cæsar, where Antony says,

> "You all did see that on the Lu'percal
> I thrice presented him a kingly crown"—

we ought to preserve it.—Mr. Barry, the actor, who was informed by some scholar of the Latin pronunciation of this word, adopted it in this place, and pronounced it Luper'cal, which grated every ear that heard him.

† Maria.—This word, says Labbe, derived from the Hebrew, has the accent on the second syllable; but when a Latin word, the feminine of Marius, it has the accent on the first.

‡ Megara.—I have in this word followed Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman, and Holyoke, by adopting the antepenultimate accent, in opposition to Lempriere, who accents the penultimate syllable.

§ Megareus.—Labbe pronounces this word in four syllables, when a noun substantive; but Ainsworth marks it as a trisyllable when a proper name, and, in my opinion, incorrectly.—See IDOMENEUS.

* Melobosis.—In this word I have given the preference to the antepenultimate accent, with Labbe, Gouldman and Holyoke; though the penultimate, which Lempriere has adopted, is more agreeable to the ear.

† Mulucha.—This word is accented on the antepenultimate syllable by Labbe, Lempriere and Ainsworth; and on the penultimate by Gouldman and Holyoke. Labbe, indeed, says ut volueris; and I shall certainly avail myself of this permission to place the accent on the penultimate; for, when this syllable ends with u, the English have a strong propensity to place the accent on it, even in opposition to etymology, as in the word Arbutus.

‡ Mycale and Mycone.—An English ear seems to have a strong predilection for the penultimate accent on these words; but all our prosodists accent them on the antepenultimate. The same may be observed of Mutina.—See note on Oryus.

§ Myrinus.—Labbe is the only prosodist I have met with, who accents this word on the antepenultimate syllable; and as this accentuation is so contrary to analogy, I have followed Lempriere, Ainsworth, Gouldman and Holyoke, with the accent on the penultimate.—See the word in the Terminational Vocabulary.

* [This word is erroneously marked by the author Nas/i-ca.—See Lempriere and Forcellini.—Ed.]

† [This word is erroneously marked by the author Ne-me/a.—See Forcellini, and Virgil, Æneid. viii. 295.—Ed.]

‡ Neobule.—Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman, Littleton and Holyoke, give this word the penultimate accent, and therefore I have preferred it to the antepenultimate accent, given it by Lempriere; not only from the number of authorities in its favor, but from its being more agreeable to analogy.

§ Neoris.—The authorities are nearly equally balanced between the penultimate and antepenultimate accent; and therefore I may say, as Labbe sometimes does, ut volueris: but I am inclined rather to the antepenultimate accent, as more agreeable to analogy, though I think the penultimate more agreeable to the ear.

‖ Nereus.—

> "Old Nereus to the Sea was born of Earth—
> Nereus, who claims the precedence in birth
> To their descendants; him old god they call,
> Because sincere and affable to all."
> Cooke's Hesiod. Theog. v. 357.

¶ Nonacris.—Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman and Holyoke give this word the antepenultimate accent; but Lempriere, Littleton, and the Graduses, place the accent, more agreeably to analogy, on the penultimate.

 Numicus.—

> "————————Our fleet Apollo sends
> Where Tuscan Tiber rolls with rapid force,
> And where Numicus opes his holy source."
> Dryden.

†† Nundina.—Lempriere places the accent on the penultimate syllable of this word; but Labbe, Gouldman and Holyoke on the antepenultimate. Ainsworth marks it in the same manner among the appellatives, nor can there be any doubt of its propriety.

‡‡ Oceana.—So prone are the English to lay the accent on the penultimate of words of this termination, that we scarcely ever hear the famous Oceana of Harrington pronounced otherwise.

§§ Œagarus.—This diphthong, like æ, is pronounced as the single vowel e. If the conjecture concerning the sound of æ was right, the middle sound between the o and e of the ancients must, in all probability, have been the sound of our a in water.—See the word Æa.

* Ogyges.—This word is by all our prosodists accented on the first syllable, and, consequently, it must sound exactly as if written Odd/je-jez; and this, however odd to an English ear, must be complied with.

† Omphale.—The accentuation which a mere English speaker would give to this word was experienced a few years ago by a pantomime called Hercules and Omphale; when the whole town concurred in placing the accent on the second syllable, till some classical scholars gave a check to this pronunciation by placing the accent on the first. This, however, was far from banishing the former manner, and disturbed the public ear without correcting it. Those, however, who would not wish to be numbered among the vulgar, must take care to avoid the penultimate accent.

‡ Orpheus.—See IDOMENEUS.

§ Oryus.—

"And, at once, Broteas and Oryus slew:
Oryus' mother, Mycalè, was known
Down from her sphere to draw the lab'ring moon."
GARTH'S Ovid. Met.

‖ Palmyra.—Nothing can be better fixed in an English ear than the penultimate accentuation of this word: this pronunciation is adopted by Ainsworth and Lempriere. Gouldman and Holyoke seem to look the other way; but Labbe says the more learned give this word the antepenultimate accent, and that this accent is more agreeable to the general rule. Those, however, must be pedantic coxcombs, who should attempt to disturb the received pronunciation when in English, because a contrary accentuation may possibly be proved to be more agreeable to Greek or Latin.

¶ Pammenes.—I find this word no where but in Lempriere, who accents it on the penultimate; but as all words of this termination have the antepenultimate accent, till this appears an exception, I shall venture to alter it.

 Pantheon.—This word is universally pronounced with the accent on the second syllable in English, but in Latin it has its first syllable accented; and this accentuation makes so slight a difference to the ear, that it ought to have the preference.

†† Papias.—This is the name of an early Christian writer, who first propagated the doctrine of the millennium; and it is generally pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, but I believe corruptly, since Labbe has adopted the antepenultimate accent, who must be well acquainted with the true pronunciation of ecclesiastical characters.

* Parysatis.—Labbe tells us that some prosodists contend that this word ought to be accented on the antepenultimate syllable, and we find Lempriere has so accented it; but so popular a tragedy as Alexander, which every where accents the penultimate, has fixed this pronunciation in our own country beyond a doubt.

† Patroclus.—Lempriere, Ainsworth, Gouldman and Holyoke accent the penultimate syllable of this word; but Labbe the antepenultimate: our Graduses pronounce it either way; but I do not hesitate to prefer the penultimate accent; and, till some good reason be given for the contrary, I think Patrocles the historian, and Patrocli a small island, ought to be pronounced with the same accent as the friend of Achilles.

‡ Phalereus.—There is some doubt among the learned whether this word ought to be pronounced in three or four syllables; that is, as Phal-e-reus, or Pha-le-re-us. The latter mode, however, with the accent on the antepenultimate, seems to be the most eligible.

§ Pharnaces.—All our prosodists accent the antepenultimate syllable of this word; but an English ear is strongly inclined to accent the penultimate, as in Arbaces and Arsaces, which see.

‖ Philomedia.—

"Nor less by Philomedia known on earth;
A name derived immediate from her birth."

* Pleiades.—

"When with their domes the slow-pac'd snails retreat
Beneath some foliage from the burning heat
Of the Pleïades, your tools prepare;
The ripen'd harvest then deserves your care."

COOKE'S Hesiod. Works and Days.

The translator has adhered strictly to the original Πληϊαδες in making this word four syllables. Virgil has done the same:

"Pleïadas, Hyadas, claramque Lycaonis Arcton."

Georgic. I.

But Ovid has contracted this word into three syllables:

"Pleiades incipiunt humeros relevare paternos."

Fasti, iv. p. 169.

The latter translators of the classics have generally contracted this word to three syllables. Thus, in Ogilby's translation of Virgil's Georgics, b. 1:

"First let the eastern Pleiades go down,
And the bright star in Ariadne's crown."
"The Pleiades and Hyades appear;
The sad companions of the turning year."

CREECH'S Manilius.

But Dryden has, to the great detriment of the poetical sound of this word, anglicised it, by squeezing it into two syllables:

"What are to him the sculpture of the shield,
Heaven's planets, earth, and ocean's watery field,
The Pleiads, Hyads, less and greater Bear,
Undipp'd in seas, Orion's angry star?"

OVID'S Met. b. 12.

This unpleasant contraction of Dryden's seems not to have been much followed. Elegant speakers are pretty uniform in preferring the trisyllable; but a considerable variety appears in the sound of the diphthong ei. Most speakers pronounce it like the substantive eye; and this pronunciation is defended by the common practice in most schools, of sounding the diphthong ει in this manner in appellatives; but though Greek appellatives preserve the original sound of their letters, as φιλαυτία, προβάτιον, κ. τ. λ., where the t does not slide into sh, as in Latin words; yet proper names, which are transplanted into all languages, partake of the soil into which they are received, and fall in with the analogies of the language which adopts them. There is, therefore, no more reason for preserving the sound of ει in proper names, than for pronouncing the c like k in Phocion, Lacedæmon, &c.

But perhaps it will be said, that our diphthong ei has the sound of eye as well as the Greek ει. To which it may be answered, that this is an irregular sound of these vowels, and can scarcely be produced as an example, since it exists but in either, neither, height, and sleight. The two first words are more frequently and analogically pronounced eether, neether; and height is often pronounced so as to rhyme with weight, and would, in all probability, be always so pronounced, but for the false supposition, that the abstract must preserve the sound of the verb or adjective from which it is derived; and with respect to sleight, though Dr. Johnson says it ought to be written slight, as we sometimes see it, yet, if we observe his authorities, we shall find that several respectable authors spelt the word in this manner; and if we consult Junius and Skinner, particularly the last, we shall see the strongest reason from etymology to prefer this spelling, as in all probability it comes from sly. The analogical pronunciation, therefore, of this diphthong in our own language is either as heard in vein, rein, &c., or in perceive, receive, &c. The latter is adopted by many speakers in the present word, as if written Pleeades; but Plyades, though less analogical, must be owned to be the more polite and literary pronunciation.—See note on Elegeia in the Terminational Vocabulary.

* Popilius Lænas.—Nothing can show the dignity of the Roman commonwealth and the terror of its arms, more than the conduct of this man. He was sent as an ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, and was commissioned to order that monarch to abstain from hostilities against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus, who was at the head of his army when he received this order, wished to evade it by equivocal answers; but Popilius, with a stick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the sand, and bade him, in the name of the Roman senate and people, not to go beyond it before he spoke decisively. This boldness intimidated Antiochus: he withdrew his garrisons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war against Ptolemy.

* [The regular pronunciation, Rome, is now more common.—Ed.]

† Sandace.—A sister of Xerxes, which I find in no lexicographer but Lempriere, and in him with the accent on the first syllable, but, from its Greek original Σανδαυκη, it ought certainly to be accented on the second syllable.

‡ Sapores.—This word, says Labbe, is by Gavantus and others, ignorant of the Greek, accented on the first syllable.

§ Seleucia.—Lempriere and Labbe accent this word on the penultimate; but Ainsworth, Gouldman and Holyoke on the antepenultimate. As this word, according to Strabo, had its penultimate formed of the diphthong ει, Σελευκεια, this syllable ought to have the accent; but as the antepenultimate accent is so incorporated into our tongue, I would strongly recommend the pronunciation which an English scholar would give it at first sight, and that is, placing the accent on the u. This is the accent Milton gives it:

"————Eden stretch'd her line
From Auran eastward to the royal tow'rs
Of great Seleucia, built by Grecian kings."

Par. Lost, b. 4.

If, however, the English scholar wishes to shine in the classical pronunciation of this word, let him take care to pronounce the c like s only, and not like sh, which sound it necessarily has, if the accent be on the antepenultimate syllable. See Rules 10 and 30.

‖ Serapis.—There is not a dissenting voice among our prosodists against the pronouncing of this word with the accent on the penultimate syllable; and yet, to show the tendency of English pronunciation, when a ship of this name had a desperate engagement with one of the French, which attracted the attention of the public, every body pronounced it with the accent on the first syllable. Milton has done the same in his sublime description of the grandeurs of Pandemonium.

"————————Not Babylon
Nor great Alcairo such magnificence
Equall'd in all their glories to enshrine
Belus or Serapis their gods; or seat
Their kings, when Egypt with Assyria strove,
In wealth and luxury."

Par. Lost, b. i. v. 717.

* Sergiolus.—I find this word in no dictionary but Lempriere's, and there the accent is placed upon the penultimate instead of the antepenultimate syllable.

† Severus.—This word, like Serapis, is universally mispronounced, by the mere English scholar, with the accent on the first syllable.

‡ Smintheus.—This word, like Orpheus, and others of the same form, has the accent on the first syllable; but poets often contract the two last syllables into one; as Pope:

"O, Smintheus, sprung from fair Latona's line,
Thou guardian pow'r of Cilla the divine!"

See IDOMENEUS.

§ Sophronicus.—I find this word in no prosodist but Labbe; and he places the accent on the penultimate syllable, like most other words of this termination; unless, says he, any one thinks it more likely to be derived from Sophron, than from victory; that is, by uniting a general termination to the root of the word, than combining it with another word significant of itself: but as there is a Greek adjective Σωφρονικος, signifying ordained by nature to temperance, it is much more probable that Sophronicus is this adjective used substantively, than that it should be compounded of Σωφρων and νικος, conquering temperance; and therefore the antepenultimate accent seems preferable.

‖ Sporades.—This word has the accent placed on the first syllable by all our prosodists; but a mere English ear is not only inclined to place the accent on the second syllable, but to pronounce the word as if it were a dissyllable, Spo-rades; but this is so gross an error, that it cannot be too carefully avoided.

¶ Suidas.—This word is generally heard, even among the learned, in two syllables, as if written Sui-das. Labbe, however, makes it three syllables, and accents the first; although, says he, by what right I know not, it is generally pronounced with the accent on the penultimate. It may be observed, that, if we place the accent on the first syllable, the i in the second must be pronounced like e; and that the general pronunciation, which Labbe complains of, that of placing the accent on the second syllable, must, in our English pronunciation of Greek or Latin words, preserve the i in its long open sound, as in idle; if, therefore, we pronounce the i in this manner, it is a sufficient proof that we place the accent on the penultimate syllable; which, though common, is, as Labbe observes, without good authority.

* Taygetus and Taygete.—All our prosodists but Lempriere accent these words on the antepenultimate syllable, as if divided into Ta-yg'e-tus and Ta-yg'e-te. I am, therefore, rather inclined to suppose the quantity marked in his dictionary an error of the press. The lines in Lily's Quæ Genus will easily call to the recollection of every scholar how early he adopted the antepenultimate pronunciation:

"Tartara, Taygetus, sic Tænera, Massica, et altus Gargarus. . . . . ."

† Tereus.—For words of this termination, see IDOMENEUS.

‡ Thebes.—Thebes in Egypt was called Hecatom'pylos, from having a hundred gates; and Thebes in Greece Heptap'ylos, from its seven gates.

§ Thessalonica.—This word, like every other of a similar termination, is sure to be pronounced by a mere English scholar with the accent on the third syllable; but this must be avoided on pain of literary excommunication.

* Thon, a physician of Egypt.—Milton spells this word with the final e, making it one syllable only, and consequently pronouncing it so as to rhyme with tone:

> "Not that Nepenthe, which the wife of Thone,
> In Egypt, gave to Jove-born Helena,
> Is of such power to stir up joy as this"——

† Troilus.—This word is almost always heard as if it were two syliables only, and as if written Troy'lus. This is a corruption of the first magnitude: the vowels should be kept separate, as if written Tro'e-lus.—See Zoilus.

‡ Tyaneus.—This word is only used as an adjective to Apollonius, the celebrated Pythagorean philosopher, and is formed from the town of Tyana, where he was born. The natural formation of this adjective would undoubtedly be Tyaneus, with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable. Labbe, at the word Tyana, says, "et inde deductum Tyaneus; quidquid sciam reclamare nonnullos sed immerito, ut satis norunt eruditi."

The numberless authorities, which might be brought for pronouncing this word either way, sufficiently show how equivocal is its accent, and of how little importance it is to which we give the preference. My private opinion coincides with Labbe; but, as we generally find it written with the diphthong, we may presume the penultimate accent has prevailed, and that it is the safest to follow.

§ Tydeus.—This word, like several others of the same termination, was pronounced by the Greeks sometimes in three and sometimes in two syllables, the eu considered as a diphthong. When it was pronounced in three syllables, the penultimate syllable was long, and the accent was on it, as we find it in a verse of Wilkie's Epigoniad:

> "Venus, still partial to the Theban arms,
> Tydeus' son seduc'd by female charms."

But the most prevailing pronunciation was that with the antepenultimate accent, as we generally find it in Pope's Homer:

> "Next came Idomeneus and Tydeus' son,
> Ajax the less, and Ajax Telamon."
> Pope's Hom. b. ii. v. 50.

See Idomeneus.

* Venafrum.—Though the accent may be placed either on the antepenultimate or the penultimate syllable of this word, the latter is by far the preferable, as it is adopted by Lempriere, Labbe, Gouldman, and other good authorities.

† Verrugo.—I have given this word the penultimate accent with Lempriere, in opposition to Ainsworth, who adopts the antepenultimate.

‡ Zenodotus.—All our prosodists but Lempriere give this word the antepenultimate accent; and, till a good reason be given why it should differ from Herodotus, I must beg leave to follow the majority.

§ Zoilus.—The two vowels in this word are always separated in the Greek and Latin, but in the English pronunciation of it they are frequently blended into a diphthong, as in the words oil, boil, &c This, however, is an illiterate pronunciation, and should be avoided. The word should have three syllables, and be pronounced as if written Zo'e-lus.

BY inspecting the foregoing Vocabulary, we see that, notwithstanding all the barriers with which the learned have guarded the accentuation of the dead languages, still some words there are which despise their laws, and boldly adopt the analogy of English pronunciation. It is true, the catalogue of these is not very numerous; for, as an error of this kind incurs the penalty of being thought illiterate and vulgar, it is no wonder that a pedantic adherence to Greek and Latin should, in doubtful cases, be generally preferred.

But as the letters of the dead languages have insensibly changed their sound by passing into the living ones, so it is impossible to preserve the accent from sliding sometimes into the analogies of our own tongue; and when once words of this kind are fixed in the public ear, it is not only a useless, but a pernicious pedantry to disturb them. Who could hear without pity of Alexander's passing the river Grani'cus, or of his marrying the sister of Parys'atis? These words, and several others, must be looked upon as planets shot from their original spheres, and moving round another centre.

After all the care, therefore, that has been taken to accent words according to the best authorities, some have been found so differently marked by different prosodists, as to make it no easy matter to know to which we shall give the preference. In this case, I have ventured to give my opinion, without presuming to decide, and merely as an Ἡνωτικον, or Interim, till the learned have pronounced the final sentence.

PREFACE

TO THE

TERMINATIONAL VOCABULARY.

TAKING a retrospective view of language, or surveying it in its terminations, affords not only a new but an advantageous view of all languages. The necessity of this view induced me, several years ago, to arrange the whole English language according to its terminations; and this arrangement I found of infinite use to me in consulting the analogies of our tongue. A conviction of its utility made me desirous of arranging the Greek and Latin proper names in the same manner, and more particularly as the pronunciation of these languages depends more on the termination of words than any other we are acquainted with. Of such utility is this arrangement supposed to be in the Greek language, that the son of the famous Hoogeven, who wrote on the Greek particles, has actually printed such a dictionary, which only waits for a preface to be published. The labor of such a selection and arrangement must have been prodigious; nor is the task I have undertaken in the present work a slight one; but the idea of rendering the classical pronunciation of proper names still more easy, encouraged me to persevere in the labor, however dry and fatiguing.

I flattered myself I had already promoted this end, by dividing the proper names into syllables upon analogical principles; but hoped I could still add to the facility of recollecting their pronunciation by the arrangement here adopted; which, in the first place, exhibits the accent and quantity of every word by its termination.

In the next place, it shows the extent of this accentuation, by producing, at one view, all the words differently accented, by which means may be formed the rule and the exception.

Thirdly, when the exceptions are but few, and less apt to be regarded, by seeing them contrasted with the rule, they are imprinted more strongly on the memory, and are the more easily recollected. Thus, by seeing that Sperchius, Xenophontius, and Darius, are the only words of that very numerous termination which have the accent on the penultimate, we are at perfect ease about all the rest.

Fourthly, by seeing that all words ending in enes have universally the antepenultimate accent, we easily recollect that the pronunciation of Eumenes with the accent on the penultimate is radically wrong, and is only tolerated because adopted by some respectable writers. Thus, too, the numerous termination in ades is seen to be perfectly antepenultimate; and the ambiguous termination in ides is freed in some measure from its intricacy, by seeing the extent of both forms contrasted. This contrast, without being obliged to go to Greek etymologies, shows at one view when this termination has the accent on the penultimate i, as in Tydides, and when it transfers the accent to the antepenultimate, as in Thucydides; which depends entirely on the quantity of the original word from which these patronymics are formed.

And, lastly, when the number of words pronounced with a different accent are nearly equal, we can at least find some way of recollecting their several accentuations better than if they were promiscuously mingled with all the rest of the words in the language. By frequently repeating them as they stand together, the ear will gain a habit of placing the accent properly, without knowing why it does so. In short, if Labbe's Catholici Indices, which is in the hands of all the learned, be useful for readily finding the accent and quantity of proper names, the present Index cannot fail to be much more so, as it not only associates them by their accent and quantity, but according to their termination also; and by this additional association it must necessarily render any diversity of accent more easily perceived and remembered.

To all which advantages it may be added, that this arrangement has enabled me to point out the true sound of every termination; by which means those who are totally unacquainted with the learned languages will find themselves instructed in the true pronunciation of the final letters of every word, as well as its accent and quantity.

It need scarcely be observed, that, in the following Index, almost all words of two syllables are omitted; for, as dissyllables in the Greek and Latin languages are always pronounced with the accent on the first, it was needless to insert them. The same may be observed of such words as have the vowel in the penultimate syllable followed by two consonants; for, in this case, unless the former of these consonants was a mute, and the latter a liquid, the penultimate vowel was always long, and consequently always had the accent. This analogy takes place in our pronunciation of words from the Hebrew; which, with the exception of some few that have been Anglicised, such as Bethlehemite, Nazarene, &c., have the accent, like the Greek and Latin words, either on the penultimate or antepenultimate syllable.

It might have been expected that I should have confined myself to the insertion of proper names alone, without bringing in the gentile adjectives, as they are called, which are derived from them. This omission would, undoubtedly, have saved me immense trouble; but these adjectives, being sometimes used as substantives, made it difficult to draw the line; and, as the analogy of accentuation was, in some measure, connected with these adjectives, I hoped the trouble of collecting and arranging them would not be entirely thrown away.

* As the accent is never on the last syllable of Greek or Latin proper names, the final a must be pronounced as in English words of this termination; that is, nearly as the interjection ah!—See Rule 7, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary.

† Of all the words ending in ica, Cleonica, Veronica, and Thessalonica, are the only three which have the penultimate accent.—See Rule the 29th, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary, and the words Andronicus and Sophronicus.

‡ Labbe tells us that some of the most learned men pronounce this part of America with the accent on the penultimate syllable.

§ The vowels in this termination do not form a diphthong. The accent is upon the first a, the i is pronounced like y consonant in year, and the final a nearly like the a in father, or the interjection ah!—See Rule 7.

‖ Words of this termination have the cia pronounced as if written she-a.—See Rule 10, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary.

¶ See Rule 30, and the word in the Initial Vocabulary.

 See Iphigenia, in the Initial Vocabulary.

†† The ancients sometimes separated the vowels ei in this termination, and sometimes pronounced them as a diphthong. The general mode of pronouncing them, with us, is to consider them as a diphthong, and to pronounce it as long or double e; which, from its squeezed sound, approaches to the initial y, and makes these words pronounced as if written El-e-je'yah, Hy-je'yah, &c. This is the pronunciation which ought to be adopted; but scholars, who are fond of displaying their knowledge of Greek, will be sure to pronounce Elegeia, Hygeia, or rather Hygieia, Antheia, and Deiopeia, with the diphthong like the noun eye; while Cartheia, or Carteia, Aquileia, Pompeia, and Tarpeia, of Latin original, are permitted to have their diphthongs sounded like double e, or, which is nearly the same thing, if the vowels are separated, to sound the e long as in equal, and the i as y consonant, articulating the final a.—See note on Achaia.

For a more complete idea of the sound of this diphthong, see the word Pleiades, in the Initial Vocabulary. To which observations we may add, that, when this diphthong in Greek is reduced to the single long i in Latin, as in Iphigenia, Elegia, &c. it is pronounced like single i, that is, like the noun eye.

* See Rule 4 of the Initial Vocabulary.

† The termination of yæ, with the accent on the preceding syllable, must be pronounced as two similar letters; that is, as if spelt Halic-e-e, Min-e-e, &c.—See Rule 4 of the Initial Vocabulary.

‡ The i in the penultimate syllables of these words, not having the accent, must be pronounced like e. This occasions a disagreeable hiatus between this and the last syllable, and a repetition of the same sound; but at the same time is strictly according to rule.—See Rule 4 of the Initial Vocabulary.

* Imaus.—See the word in the Initial Vocabulary.

† All words of this termination have the accent on the i, pronounced like the noun eye.

‡ It may be observed, that words of this termination are sometimes both substantives and adjectives. When they are substantives, they have the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, as Nĕleus, Promĕtheus, Salmonĕus, &c.; and when adjectives, on the penultimate, as Nelēus, Promethēus, Salmonēus, &c. Thus, Œneus, a king of Calydonia, is pronounced in two syllables; the adjective Œneus, which is formed from it, is a trisyllable; and Œnëius, another formative of it, is a word of four syllables. But these words, when formed into English adjectives, alter their termination with the accent on the penultimate:

"With other notes than to the Orphëan lyre."
MILTON.

"The tuneful tongue, the Promethëan band."
ARENSIDE.

And sometimes on the antepenultimate; as,

"The sun, as from Thyestian banquet turn'd."
MILTON.

* Almost all the words of this termination are adjectives, and in these the vowels ei form distinct syllables; the others, as Cocceius, Saleius, Proculeius, Canuleius, Apuleius, Egnatuleius, Schœneius, Lampeius, Vultureius, Atteius, and Minyeius, are substantives; and which, though sometimes pronounced with the ei forming a diphthong, and sounded like the noun eye, are more generally heard like the adjectives; so that the whole list may be fairly included under the same general rule, that of sounding the e separately, and the i like y consonant, as in the similar terminations in cia and ia. This is the more necessary in these words, as the accented e and the unaccented i are so much alike, as to require the sound of the initial or consonant y, in order to prevent the hiatus, by giving a small diversity to the two vowels.—See ACHAIA.

† Labbe places the accent of this word on the penultimate, i, as in Heraclitus and Heraclidæ; but the Roman emperor of this name is so generally pronounced with the antepenultimate accent, that it would savor of pedantry to alter it. Nor do I understand the reason on which Labbe founds his accentuation.

‡ This word, the learned contend, ought to have the accent on the penultimate; but that the learned frequently depart from this pronunciation, by placing the accent on the antepenultimate, may be seen, Rule 31, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary.

RULES

SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE true pronunciation of the Hebrew language, as Doctor Lowth observes, is lost. To refer us for assistance to the Masoretic points, would be to launch us on a sea without shore or bottom: the only compass, by which we can possibly steer on this boundless ocean, is the Septuagint version of the Hebrew Bible; and, as it is highly probable the translators transfused the sound of the Hebrew proper names into the Greek, it gives us something like a clew to guide us out of the labyrinth. But even here we are often left to guess our way; for the Greek word is frequently so different from the Hebrew, as scarcely to leave any traces of similitude between them. In this case, custom and analogy must often decide, and the ear must sometimes solve the difficulty. But these difficulties relate chiefly to the accentuation of Hebrew words; and the method adopted in this point will be seen in its proper place.

I must here acknowledge my obligations to a very learned and useful work—the Scripture Lexicon of Mr. Oliver. As the first attempt to facilitate the pronunciation of Hebrew proper names, by dividing them into syllables, it deserves the highest praise: but, as I have often differed widely from this gentleman in syllabication, accentuation, and the sound of the vowels, I have thought it necessary to give my reasons for this difference, which will be seen under the Rules; of the validity of which reasons the reader will be the best judge.

N. B. As there are many Greek and Latin proper names in Scripture, particularly in the New Testament, which are to be met with in ancient history, some of them have been omitted in this selection: and therefore, if the inspector does not find them here, he is desired to seek for them in the Vocabulary of Greek and Latin Names.

RULES

FOR PRONOUNCING

SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES.

.. the pronunciation of the letters of the Hebrew proper names, we find nearly the same rules prevail as in those of Greek and Latin. Where the vowels end a syllable with the accent on it, they have their long open sound, as Na'bal, Je-hu, Si'rach, Go'shen, and Tu'bal. (See Rule 1st prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.)

2. When a consonant ends the syllable, the preceding vowel is short, as Sam'u-el, Lem'u-el, Sim'e-on, Sol'o-mon, Suc'coth, Syn'a-gogue. (See Rule 2d prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.) I here differ widely from Mr. Oliver; for I cannot agree with him, that the e in Abdiel, the o in Arnon, and the u in Ashur, are to be pronounced like the ee in seen, the o in tone, and the u in tune, which is the rule he lays down for all similar words.

3. Every final i, forming a distinct syllable, though unaccented, has the long open sound, as A'i, A-ris'a-i. (See Rule 4th prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.)

4. Every unaccented i, ending a syllable, not final, is pronounced like e, as A'ri-el, Ab'di-el, pronounced A're-el, Ab'de-el. (See Rule 4th prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.)

5. The vowels ai are sometimes pronounced in one syllable, and sometimes in two. As the Septuagint version is our chief guide in the pronunciation of Hebrew proper names, it may be observed, that when these letters are pronounced as a diphthong in one syllable, like our English diphthong in the word daily, they are either a diphthong in the Greek word, or expressed by the Greek ε or ι, as Ben-ai'ah, Βαναια; Hu'shai, Χουσὶ; Hu'rai, Ουρὶ, &c.; and that when they are pronounced in two syllables, as Sham'ma-i, Shash'a-i, Ber-a-i'ah, it is because the Greek words by which they are translated, as Σαμαὶ, Σεσὶ, Βαραΐα, make two syllables of these vowels. Mr. Oliver has not always attended to this distinction: he makes Sin'a-i three syllables, though the Greeks made it but two in Σινᾶ. That accurate prosodist, Labbe, indeed, makes it a trisyllable; but he does the same by Aaron and Canaan, which our great classic Milton uniformly reduces to two syllables, as well as Sinai. If we were to pronounce it in three syllables, we must necessarily make the first syllable short, as in Shim'e-i; but this is so contrary to the best usage, that it amounts to a proof that it ought to be pronounced in two syllables, with the first i long, as in Shi'nar. This, however, must be looked upon as a general rule only: these vowels in Isaiah, Græcised by Ησαΐας, are always pronounced as a diphthong, or, at least, with the accent on the a, and the i like y articulating the succeeding vowel; in Caiaphas, likewise, the ai is pronounced like a diphthong, though divided in the Greek Καϊάφας; which division cannot take place in this word, because the i must then necessarily have the accent, and must be pronounced as in Isaac, as Mr. Oliver has marked it; but I think contrary to universal usage. The only point necessary to be observed in the sound of this diphthong is, the slight difference we perceive between its medial and final position: when it is final, it is exactly like the English ay without the accent, as in holyday, roundelay, galloway; but when it is in the middle of a word, and followed by a vowel, the i is pronounced as if it were y, and as if this y articulated the succeeding vowel: thus Ben-ai'ah is pronounced as if written Ben-a'yah.

6. Ch is pronounced like k, as Chebar, Chemosh, Enoch, &c., pronounced Kebar, Kemosh, Enock, &c. Cherubim and Rachel seem to be perfectly Anglicised, as the ch in these words is always heard as in the English words cheer, child, riches, &c. (See Rule 12th prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.) The same may be observed of Cherub, signifying an order of angels; but when it means a city of the Babylonish empire, it ought to be pronounced Ke'rub.

7. Almost the only difference in the pronunciation of the Hebrew, and the Greek and Latin proper names, is in the sound of the g before e and i: in the two last languages, this consonant is always soft before these vowels, as Gellius, Gippius, &c., pronounced Jellius, Jippius, &c.; and in the first, it is hard, as Gera, Gerizim, Gideon, Gilgal, Megiddo, Megiddon, &c. This difference is without all foundation in etymology; for both g and c were always hard in the Greek and Latin languages, as well as in the Hebrew; but the latter language being studied so much less than the Greek and Latin, it has not undergone that change which familiarity is sure to produce in all languages: and even the solemn distance of this language has not been able to keep the letter c from sliding into s before e and i, in the same manner as in the Greek and Latin: thus, though Gehazi, Gideon, &c., have the g hard, Cedrom, Cedron, Cisai, and Cittern, have the c soft, as if written Sedrom, Sedron, &c. The same may be observed of Igeabarim, Igeal, Nagge, Shage, Pagiel, with the g hard; and Ocidelus, Ocina, and Pharacion, with the c soft like s.

8. Gentiles, as they are called, ending in ines and ites, as Philistines, Hivites, Hittites, &c., being Anglicised in the translation of the Bible, are pronounced like formatives of our own, as Philistins, Whitfieldites, Jacobites, &c.

9. The unaccented termination ah, so frequent in Hebrew proper names, ought to be pronounced like the a in father. The a in this termination, however, frequently falls into the indistinct sound heard in the final a in Africa, Ætna, &c.; nor can we easily perceive any distinction in this respect between Elijah and Elisha: but the final h preserves the other vowels open, as Colhozeh, Shiloh, &c., pronounced Colhozee, Shilo, &c. (See Rule 7th prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.) The diphthong ei is always pronounced like ee: thus Sa-mei'us is pronounced as if written Sa-mee'us. But if the accent be on the ah, then the a ought to be pronounced like the a in father; as Tah'e-ra, Tah'pe-nes, &c.

10. It may be remarked, that there are several Hebrew proper names, which, by passing through the Greek of the New Testament, have conformed to the Greek pronunciation; such as Aceldama, Genesareth, Bethphage, &c., pronounced Aseldama, Jenezareth, Bethphaje, &c. This is, in my opinion, more agreeable to the general analogy of pronouncing these Hebrew-Greek words than preserving the c and g hard.

Rules for ascertaining the English Quantity of the Vowels in Hebrew Proper Names.

11. With respect to the quantity of the first vowel in dissyllables, with but one consonant in the middle, I have followed the rule which we observe in the pronunciation of such dissyllables when Greek or Latin words; (see Rule 18th prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names;) and that is, to place the accent on the first vowel, and to pronounce that vowel long, as Ko'rah, and not Kor'ah, Mo'loch, and not Mol'och, as Mr. Oliver has divided them, in opposition both to analogy and the best usage. I have observed the same analogy in the penultimate of polysyllables; and have not divided Balthasar into Bal-thas'ar, as Mr. Oliver has done, but into Bal-tha'sar.

12. In the same manner, when the accent is on the antepenultimate syllable, whether the vowel end the syllable, or be followed by two consonants, the vowel is always short, except followed by two vowels, as in Greek and Latin proper names. (See Rules prefixed to these names, Nos. 18, 19, 20, &c.) Thus Jehoshaphat has the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, according to Greek accentuation by quantity, (see Introduction to this work;) and this syllable, according to the clearest analogy of English pronunciation, is short, as if spelt Je-hosh'a-phat. The secondary accent has the same shortening power in Othonias, where the primary accent is on the third, and the secondary on the first syllable, as if spelt Oth-o-ni'as: and it is on these two fundamental principles of our own pronunciation, namely, the lengthening power of the penultimate, and the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, that I hope I have been enabled to regulate and fix many of those sounds which were floating about in uncertainty; and which, for want of this guide, are differently marked by different orthoëpists, and often differently by the same orthoëpist.

Rules for placing the Accent on Hebrew Proper Names.

13. With respect to the accent of Hebrew words, it cannot be better regulated than by the laws of the Greek language. I do not mean, however, that every Hebrew word, which is Græcised by the Septuagint, should be accented exactly according to the Greek rule of accentuation: for, if this were the case, every word ending in el would never have the accent higher than the preceding syllable; because it was a general rule in the Greek language, that, when the last syllable was long, the accent could not be higher than the penultimate: nay, strictly speaking, were we to accent these words according to the accent of that language, they ought to have the accent on the last syllable, because Αβδιὴλ and Ισραὴλ, Abdiel and Israel, have the accent on that syllable. It may be said, that this accent on the last syllable is the grave, which, when on the last word of a sentence, or succeeded by an enclitic, was changed into an acute. But here, as in words purely Greek, we find the Latin analogy prevail; and, because the penultimate is short, the accent is placed on the antepenultimate, in the same manner as in Socrates, Sosthenes, &c., though the final syllable of the Greek words Σωκράτης, Σωσθένης, &c., is long, and the Greek accent on the penultimate. (See Introduction prefixed to the Rules for pronouncing Greek and Latin Proper Names.) It is this general prevalence of accenting according to the Latin analogy, that has induced me, when the Hebrew word has been Græcised in the same number of syllables, to prefer the Latin accentuation to what may be called our own. Thus Cathua, coming to us through the Greek Καθυά, I have accented it on the penultimate, because the Latins would have placed the accent on this syllable on account of its being long, though an English ear would be better pleased with the antepenultimate accent. The same reason has induced me to accent Chaseba on the antepenultimate, because it is Græcised into Χασεβά. But when the Hebrew and Greek word does not contain the same number of syllables, as Mes'o-bah, Μεσωβία, Id'u-el, Ιδυηλος, it then comes under our own analogy, and we neglect the long vowel, and place the accent on the antepenultimate. The same may be observed of Mordecai, from Μαρδοχαῖος.

14. As we never accent a proper name from the Greek on the last syllable, (not because the Greeks did not accent the last syllable, for they had many words accented in that manner, but because this accentuation was contrary to the Latin prosody;) so, if the Greek word be accented on any other syllable, we seldom pay any regard to it, unless it coincide with the Latin accent. Thus in the word Gede'rah, I have placed the accent on the penultimate, because it is Græcised by Γάδηρα, where the accent is on the antepenultimate; and this because the penultimate is long, and this long penultimate has always the accent in Latin. (See this further exemplified, Rule 18th, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names, and Introduction, near the end.) Thus, though it may seem at first sight absurd to derive our pronunciation of Hebrew words from the Greek, and then to desert the Greek for the Latin; yet, since we must have some rule, and, if possible, a learned one, it is very natural to lay hold of the Latin, because it is nearest at hand. For as language is a mixture of reasoning and convenience, if the true reason lie too remote from common apprehension, another more obvious one is generally adopted; and this last, by general usage, becomes a rule superior to the former. It is true, the analogy of our own language would be a rule the most rational; but, while the analogies of our own language are so little understood, and the Greek and Latin languages are so justly admired, even the appearance of being acquainted with them will always be esteemed reputable, and infallibly lead us to an imitation of them, even in such points as are not only insignificant in themselves, but inconsistent with our vernacular pronunciation.

15. It is remarkable that all words ending in ias and iah have the accent on the i, without any foundation in the analogy of Greek and Latin pronunciation, except the very vague reason that the Greek word places the accent on this syllable. I call this reason vague, because the Greek accent has no influence on words in ael, iel, ial, &c., as Ισραὴλ, Αβδιὴλ, Βελίαλ, κ. τ. λ.

Hence we may conclude the impropriety of pronouncing Messias with the accent on the first syllable according to Labbe, who says we must pronounce it in this manner, if we wish to pronounce it like the French with the os rotundum et facundum; and, indeed, if the i were to be pronounced in the French manner, like e, placing the accent on the first syllable seems to have the bolder sound. This may serve as an answer to the learned critic, the editor of Labbe, who says, "the Greeks, but not the French, pronounce ore rotundo:" for though the Greeks might place the accent on the i in Μεσσίας, yet, as they certainly pronounced this vowel as the French do, it must have the same slender sound, and the accent on the first syllable must, in that respect, be preferable to it; for the Greek i, like the same letter in Latin, was the slenderest of all the vowel sounds. It is the broad diphthongal sound of the English i with the accent on it, which makes this word sound so much better in English than it does in French, or even in the true ancient Greek pronunciation.

16. The termination aim seems to attract the accent on the a only in words of more than three syllables, as E'phra-im and Miz'ra-im have the accent on the antepenultimate; but Horo-na'im, Ram-a-tha'im, &c., on the penultimate syllable. This is a general rule; but if the Greek word have the penultimate long, the accent ought to be on that syllable, as Phurva'im, Φαρυίμ, &c.

17. Kemuel, Jemuel, Nemuel, and other words of the same form, having the same number of syllables as the Greek words into which they are translated, ought to have the accent on the penultimate, as that syllable is long in Greek; but Emanuel, Samuel, and Lemuel, are irrecoverably fixed in the antepenultimate accentuation, and show the true analogy of the accentuation of our own language.

18. Thus we see what has been observed of the tendency of Greek and Latin words to desert their original accent, and to adopt that of the English, is much more observable in words from the Hebrew. Greek and Latin words are fixed in their pronunciation, by a thousand books written expressly upon the subject, and ten thousand occasions of using them; but Hebrew words, from the remote antiquity of the language, from the paucity of books in it, from its being originally written without points, and the very different style of its poetry from that of other languages, afford us scarcely any criterion to recur to for settling their pronunciation, which must therefore often be irregular and desultory. The Septuagint, indeed, gives us some light, and is the only star by which we can steer; but this is so frequently obscured, as to leave us in the dark, and force us to pronounce according to the analogy of our own language. It were to be wished, indeed, that this were to be entirely adopted in Hebrew words, where we have so little to determine us; and that those words which we have worn into our own pronunciation were to be a rule for all others of the same form and termination; but it is easier to bring about a revolution in kingdoms than in languages. Men of learning will always form a sort of literary aristocracy; they will be proud of the distinction which a knowledge of languages gives them above the vulgar, and will be fond of showing this knowledge, which the vulgar will never fail to admire and imitate.

The best we can do, therefore, is to make a sort of compromise between this ancient language and our own; to form a kind of compound ratio of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English, and to let each of these prevail as usage has permitted them. Thus Emanuel, Samuel, Lemuel, which, according to the Latin analogy and our own, have the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, ought to remain in quiet possession of their present pronunciation, notwithstanding the Greek Εμμανυὴλ, Σαμυὴλ, Λεμυὴλ; but Elishua, Esdrelon, Gederah, may have the accent on the penultimate, because the Greek words into which they are translated, Ελισυὲ, Εσδρηλὼμ, Γάδηρα, have the penultimate long. If this should not appear a satisfactory method of settling the pronunciation of these words, I must entreat those who dissent from it to point out a better: a work of this kind was wanted for general use: it is addressed neither to the learned nor the illiterate, but to that large and most respectable part of society who have a tincture of letters, but whose avocations deny them the opportunity of cultivating them. To these a work of this kind cannot fail of being useful; and by its utility to these the author wishes to stand or fall

SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES.

INITIAL VOCABULARY.

 When a word is succeeded by a word printed in Italics, this latter word is merely to spell the former as it ought to be pronounced. Thus, As'e-fa is the true pronunciation of the preceding word Ac'i-pha: and so of the rest.

 The figures annexed to the words refer to the rules prefixed to the Vocabulary. Thus the figure 3 after Ab'di refers to Rule the 3d, for the pronunciation of the final i; and the figure 5 after A-bis'sa-i refers to Rule the 5th, for the pronunciation of the unaccented ai: and so of the rest.

 For the quantity of the vowels indicated by the syllabication, see Nos. 18 and 19 of the Rules for Greek and Latin Proper Names.

 [In a few instances, the pronunciation of Perry, or of Fulton and Knight, is given below.—Ed.]

* Aaron.—This is a word of three syllables in Labbe, who says it is used to be pronounced with the accent on the penultimate; but the general pronunciation of this word in English is in two syllables, with the accent on the first, and as if written A'ron. Milton uniformly gives it this syllabication and accent:

> "Till by two brethren (those two brethren call > Moses and Aaron) sent from God to claim
> His people from inthralment."
> Par. Lost, b. xii. v. 170.

† [A-ba'na.—P.]

‡ Abarim.—This and some other words are decided in their accentuation by Milton in the following verses:

> "From Aroar to Nebo, and the wild
> Of southmost Abarim in Hesebon,
> And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
> The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines,
> And Eleälé to th' Asphaltic pool."
> Par. Lost, b. i. v. 407.
> "——————Yet his temple high
> Rear'd in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
> Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,
> And Accaron and Gaza's frontier bounds."—Ib. 463.

§ Abram, or Abraham.—The first name, of two syllables, was the patriarch's original name, but God increased it to the second, of three syllables, as a pledge of an increase in blessing. The latter name, however, from the feebleness of the h in our pronunciation of it, and from the absence of the accent, is liable to such a hiatus, from the proximity of two similar vowels, that, in the most solemn pronunciation, we seldom hear this name extended to three syllables. Milton has but once pronounced it in this manner, but has six times made it only two syllables; and this may be looked upon as the general pronunciation.

‖ Adonai.—Labbe, says his editor, makes this a word of three syllables only; which, if once admitted, why, says he, should he dissolve the Hebrew diphthong in Sadaï, Sinaï, Tolmaï, &c., and at the same time make two syllables of the diphthong in Caslcu, which are commonly united into one? In this, says he, he is inconsistent with himself.—See Sinai.

* Amen.—The only simple word in the language which has necessarily two successive accents.

† Anathema.—Those who are not acquainted with the profound researches of verbal critics would be astonished to observe what waste of learning has been bestowed on this word by Labbe, in order to show that it ought to be accented on the antepenultimate syllable. This pronunciation has been adopted by English scholars; though some divines have been heard from the pulpit to give it the penultimate accent, which so readily unites it in a trochaic pronunciation with Maranatha, in the first Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema maranatha."

‡ Areopagus.—There is a strong propensity in English readers of the New Testament to pronounce this word with the accent on the penultimate syllable, and even some foreign scholars have contended that it ought to be so pronounced, from its derivation from Ἄρειος παγὰν, the Doric dialect for πηγὴν, the fountain of Mars, which was on a hill in Athens, rather than from Ἄρειος πάγος, the hill of Mars. But Labbe very justly despises this derivation, and says, that, of all the ancient writers, none have said that the Areopagus was derived from a fountain, or from a country near to a fountain; but all have confessed that it came from a hill, or the summit of a rock, on which this famous court of judicature was built. Vossius tells us, that St. Augustine, De Civ. Dei, l. x. cap. 10, calls this word pagum Martis, the Village of Mars, and that he fell into this error because the Latin word pagus signifies a village or street; but, says he, the Greek word signifies a hill, which, perhaps, was so called from παγὰ or πηγὴ (that is, fountain), because fountains usually take their rise on hills. Wrong, however, as this derivation may be, he tells us it is adopted by no less scholars than Beza, Budæus, and Sigonius. And this may show us the uncertainty of etymology in language, and the security of general usage; but in the present case, both etymology and usage conspire to place the accent on the antepenultimate syllable. Agreeably to this usage, we find the prologue to a play observe, that,

> "The critics are assembled in the pit,
> And form an Areopagus of wit."

§ Asmadai.—Mr. Oliver has not inserted this word, but we have it in Milton:

> "———————On each wing
> Uriel and Raphaël his vaunting foe,
> Though huge, and in a rock of diamond arm'd,
> Vanquish'd, Adramelech and Asmadai."
> Par. Lost, b. vi. v. 365.

Whence we may guess the poet's pronunciation of it in three syllables; the diphthong sounding like the ai in daily.—See Rule 5, and the words Sinai and Adonai.

* Azazel.—This word is not in Mr. Oliver's Lexicon; but Milton makes use of it, and places the accent on the second syllable:

"————that proud honour claim'd
Azazel as his right; a cherub tall."
Par. Lost, b. i. v. 534.

† See Canaan, Aaron, and Israel.

‡ [Beel'zebub.—F. & K.] § [Beer'sheba.—F. & K.]

‖ Bethphage.—This word is generally pronounced by the illiterate in two syllables, and without the second h, as if written Beth'page. [Perry makes but two syllables of this word, sounding the h.—Ed.]

¶ [Beth-sai'da.—P.]  [Bez'a-leel.—P. F. & K.]

†† [Cai'nan.—P.]

‡‡ Canaan.—This word is not unfrequently pronounced in three syllables, with the accent on the second. But Milton, who in his Paradise Lost has introduced this word six times, has constantly made it two syllables, with the accent on the first. This is perfectly agreeable to the syllabication and accentuation of Isaac and Balaam, which are always heard in two syllables. This suppression of a syllable in the latter part of these words arises from the absence of accent: an accent on the second syllable would prevent the hiatus arising from the two vowels, as it does in Baal and Baalim, which are always heard in two and three syllables respectively.—See Adonai. [Both Perry and Fulton and Knight make but two syllables of this word.—Ed.]

§§ Capernaum.—This word is often, but improperly, pronounced with the accent on the penultimate.

* [Ched-er-la-o'mer.—P.]

† Deborah.—The learned editor of Labbe tells us, that this word has the penultimate long, both in Greek and Hebrew; and yet he observes that our clergy, when reading the Holy Scriptures to the people in English, always pronounce it with the accent on the first syllable; "and why not," says he, "when they place the accent on the first syllable of orator, auditor, and successor?" "But," continues he, "I suppose they accent them otherwise when they speak Latin." Who doubts it?

‡ [Di-o-treph'es.—P.]

§ [El'i-phaz.—P.]

‖ Emmaus—This word is often very improperly pronounced in two syllables, as if divided into Em'maus.

* Israel.—This word is colloquially pronounced in two syllables, and not unfrequently heard in the same manner from the pulpit. The tendency of two vowels to unite, when there is no accent to keep them distinct, is the cause of this corruption, as in Canaan, Isaac, &c.; but as there is a greater difficulty in keeping separate two unaccented vowels of the same kind, so the latter corruption is more excusable than the former; and, therefore, in my opinion, this word ought always in public pronunciation, especially in reading the Scripture, to be heard in three syllables. Milton introduces this word four times in his Paradise Lost, and constantly makes it two syllables only. But those who understand English prosody know that we have a great number of words which have two distinct impulses, that go for no more than a single syllable in verse, such as heaven, given, &c.: higher and dyer are always considered as dissyllables; and hire and dire, which have exactly the same quantity to the ear, but as monosyllables. Israel, therefore, ought always, in deliberate and solemn speaking, to be heard in three syllables. The same may be observed of Raphael and Michael.

* [The regular pronunciation, Pentecŏst, is now more common.—Ed.]

† [Ram'e-ses.—P.]

‡ Raphael.—This word has uniformly the accent on the first syllable throughout Milton, though Græcised by Ῥαφαήλ; but the quantity is not so invariably settled by him; for, in his Paradise Lost, he makes it four times of three syllables, and twice of two. What is observed under Israel is applicable to this word. Colloquially, we may pronounce it in two, as if written Raphel; but in deliberate and solemn speaking or reading, we ought to make the two last vowels to be heard separately and distinctly. The same may be observed of Michael, which Milton, in his Paradise Lost, uses six times as a word of three syllables, and eighteen times as a word of two only.

§ [Reu'el.—P.]

‖ Sabacthani.—Some, says the editor of Labbe, place the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of this word, and others on the penultimate: this last pronunciation, he says, is most agreeable to the Hebrew word, the penultimate of which is not only long, but accented: and, as this word is Hebrew, it is certainly the preferable pronunciation.

¶ Sabaoth.—This word should not be confounded in its pronunciation with Sabbath, a word of so different a signification. Sabaoth ought to be heard in three syllables, by keeping the a and o separate and distinct. This, it must be confessed, is not very easy to do, but is absolutely necessary to prevent a very gross confusion of ideas, and a perversion of the sense. [Fulton and Knight accent this word Sab-a'oth.]

 Satan.—There is some dispute among the learned about the quantity of the second syllable of this word when Latin or Greek, as may be seen in Labbe, but none about the first. This is acknowledged to be short; and this has induced those critics who have great knowledge of Latin, and very little of their own language, to pronounce the first syllable short in English, as if written Sattan. If these gentlemen have not perused the Principles of Pronunciation, prefixed to the Critical Pronouncing Dictionary, I would take the liberty of referring them to what is there said, for full satisfaction, for whatever relates to deriving English quantity from the Latin. But for those who have not an opportunity of inspecting that work, it may, perhaps, be sufficient to observe, that no analogy is more universal than that which, in a Latin word of two syllables, with but one consonant in the middle, and the accent on the first syllable, leads us to pronounce that syllable long. This is, likewise, the genuine pronunciation of English words of the same form; and where it has been counteracted, we find a miserable attempt to follow the Latin quantity in the English word, which we entirely neglect in the Latin itself, (see Introduction, page 946.) Cato and Plato are instances where we make the vowel a long in English, where it is short in Latin; and caligo and cogito, where we make the a and o in the first syllable short in English, when it is long in Latin. Thus, if a word of two syllables, with one consonant in the middle, and the accent on the first, which, according to our own vernacular analogy, we should pronounce as we do Cato and Plato, with the first vowel long: if this word, I say, happen to be derived from a word of three syllables in Latin, with the first short; this is looked upon as a good reason for shortening the first syllable of the English word, as in magic, placid, tepid, &c., though we violate this rule in the pronunciation of the Latin words caligo, cogito, &c., which, according to this analogy, ought to be cale-i-go, coge-i-to, &c., with the first syllable long.

This pedantry, which ought to have a harsher title, has considerably hurt the sound of our language, by introducing into it too many short vowels, and consequently rendering it less flowing and sonorous. The tendency of the penultimate accent to open and lengthen the first vowel in dissyllables, with but one consonant in the middle, in some measure counteracts the shortening tendency of two consonants, and the almost invariable shortening tendency of the antepenultimate accent; but this analogy, which seems to be the genuine operation of nature, is violated by these ignorant critics from the pitiful ambition of appearing to understand Latin. As the first syllable, therefore, of the word in question has its first vowel pronounced short for such miserable reasons as have been shown, and this short pronunciation does not seem to be general, we ought certainly to incline to that pronunciation which is so agreeable to the analogy of our own language, and which is, at the same time, so much more pleasing to the ear.

‡ Siloa.—This word, according to the present general rule of pronouncing these words, ought to have the accent on the second syllable, as it is Græcised by Σιλωὰ; but Milton, who understood its derivation as well as the present race of critics, has given it the antepenultimate accent, as more agreeable to the general analogy of accenting English words of the same form:

"————————Or if Sion hill
Delight thee more, or Siloa's brook, that flow'd
Fast by the oracle of God————————"

If criticism ought not to overturn settled usages, surely when that usage is sanctioned by such a poet as Milton, it ought not to be looked upon as a license, but an authority. With respect to the quantity of the first syllable, analogy requires that, if the accent be on it, it should be short.—See Rules prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names, Rule 19.

§ Sinai.—If we pronounce this word after the Hebrew, it has three syllables; if after the Greek, Σινᾶ, two only; though it must be confessed, that the liberty allowed to poets of increasing the end of a line with one, and sometimes two syllables, renders their authority, in this case, a little equivocal. Labbe adopts the former pronunciation, but general usage seems to prefer the latter: and if we almost universally follow the Greek in other cases, why not in this? Milton adopts the Greek:

"Sing, heav'nly muse! that on the secret top
Of Oreb or of Sinai didst inspire
That shepherd————"

"God, from the mount of Sinai, whose gray top
Shall tremble, he, descending, will himself,
In thunder, lightning, and loud trumpets' sound,
Ordain them laws."

Par. Lost, b. xii. v. 227.

We ought not, indeed, to lay too much stress on the quantity of Milton, which is often so different in the same word; but these are the only two passages in his Paradise Lost where ¶ Zabulon.—"Notwithstanding," says the editor of Labbe, "this word in Greek, Ζαβελὼν, has the penultimate long, yet in our churches we always hear it pronounced with the acute on the antepenultimate. Those who thus pronounce it plead that, in Hebrew, the penultimate vowel is short; but, in the word Zorobabel, Ζοροβάβελ, they follow a different rule; for, though the penultimate in Hebrew is long, they pronounce it with the antepenultimate accent."
